PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 101st CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE—Monday, February 27, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 12:00:17 o'clock p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will recess under the order.

RECESS UNTIL 2:15 P.M. TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1989

Thereupon, at 12:00:17:6 o'clock p.m., the Senate recessed until Tuesday, February 28, 1989, at 2:15 p.m.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a member of the Senate on the floor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, February 27, 1989

The House met at 12 noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. COELHO].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 24, 1989.

I hereby designate the Honorable TONY COELHO to act as Speaker pro tempore on Monday, February 27, 1989.

JIM WRIGHT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

While we admit, O God, the complexities of life with the tension and testing of our values, our traditions, our faith, may we yet see in human history that illuminating thread of Your truth that points through the maze of life and highlights the continuity of Your love to us and to all people. May not the conflicts of values or traditions allow us to turn away from the beauty of Your direction, Your guidance, and Your peace. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] will lead us in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. FROST led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 24, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5 of Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, the Clerk received at 2:25 p.m. on Friday, February 24, 1989 the following message from the Secretary of the Senate: That the Senate will resume the consideration of the Articles of Impeachment against Judge Alcee L. Hastings on March 8, 1989; the Senate appointed Mr. DeConcini as a member of the National Advisory Commission on Law Enforcement; the Senate appointed Mr. Boschwitz and Mr. Coats as members of the National Advisory Commission on Law Enforcement; the Senate appointed Mr. DeConcini, Chairman; Mr. Lautenberg; Mr. Fowler; Mr. Wirth; and Mr. Reid as members of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe; and the Senate appointed Mr. Biden as Chairman of the Senate Delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly during the One Hundred First Congress.

With great respect, I am,
Sincerely yours,

DONNALD K. ANDERSON,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF COMMISSION ON U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BICENTENARY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On behalf of the Speaker, and without objection, pursuant to the provisions of section 3, House Resolution 83, 101st Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Commission on the U.S. House of Representatives Bicentenary the following Members of the House:

Mrs. BOGGS of Louisiana, chairman;
Mr. SHARP of Indiana;
Mr. FOGLIETTA of Pennsylvania;
Mr. SHUSTER of Pennsylvania;
Mr. GINGRICH of Georgia; and
Mr. HENRY of Michigan.

And the following former Members of the House:

Mr. Vandergriff of Texas; and
Mr. Rhodes of Arizona.

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO COACH LANDRY

(Mr. FROST asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, Saturday at Valley Ranch in the 24th District of Texas a momentous event occurred. The Dallas Cowboys were sold to a new owner and Tom Landry was relieved of his duties as head coach. This event should not be allowed to pass without comment.

No one can dispute a new owner's right to hire anyone he wants to coach his team. However, Tom Landry's tenure with the Cowboys deserves recognition.

Coach Landry spent 29 years as the Cowboy's head coach. He started with an expansion team and built it into a consistent winner, taking his team to the playoffs 18 years, going to the Super Bowl five times and winning the Super Bowl twice. All told, he won 270 games and was a major influence on professional football.

Coach Landry influenced a whole generation of NFL coaches and developed strategy that was followed by other teams for years. His former assistants who became head coaches took teams to the Super Bowl in Chicago, Denver, and New England.

Coach Landry was always dignified on and off the field. Few figures in professional sports have enjoyed more success or been more envied. We will not see another coach of his vision or influence for a long time. The Dallas Cowboys owe him a great debt of gratitude as do sports fans across the country.

It is right that we all pause a moment and say "Job well done, Tom."

POSTAL PATRON MAILING BY SENATORS

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, last week the Senate Rules and Administration Committee provided that Senators could use postal patron mailings for the first time, at least in the modern era. This means that for every postal patron mailing put out by the full Senate, the total cost to the taxpayers would be in excess of $25 million.

My rough calculation is that that is about what it would have cost the House and Senate for a pay raise which they said they were unwilling to do, but they are willing to put it into their postal allowance to increase their chances of being reelected.

I believe that the mailing costs of both the House and the Senate are excessive. I believe that the House and Senate must come to an agreement which reduces them.

An election year faces us now in fiscal year 1990 in which costs are going to escalate. The last election year we spent 50 percent more than we appropriated. I think the only way to do it is to negate the appropriation in the appropriation bill for franks until the House and Senate get together and establish some law and order.

SAVINGS AND LOANS SHOULD STICK TO HOME MORTGAGES

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the plan to solve the savings and loan crisis put forth by President Bush has a number of outstanding points, but there are also some glaring weaknesses.

One of the big reasons why a number of savings and loans got into trouble is that instead of sticking to traditional home mortgage lending, these institutions branched out into many areas that posed risks, such as investing in windmill farms, racetracks, speculative lending purchases, and other high flying schemes.

Unfortunately, the Bush plan does not prevent savings and loans from continuing to make the same type of investments that got them into trouble. The Bush plan merely says that if the savings and loans raise more money in the form of private capital they can continue to make these risky investments.

I think that is the wrong approach. When the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance begins to mark up President Bush's plan, I will offer an amendment that will require all federally insured savings and loans to keep at least 80 percent of all of their loans in one to four single family home mortgages within a 50-mile area of any of their offices. Any other loans would have to be placed in a 20-percent basket, including any loans outside the 50-mile area.

Speculative type investments such as those announced in the Bush plan would be eliminated. I do not think President Bush intended to allow the problem of speculative investments to continue, but I was shocked when Secretary Nicholas Brady appeared before the House Banking Committee recently and said that the administration could not support my plan. He said that the administration wanted to allow the industry to continue on its deregulation path.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for Members of Congress and the American people to make their voices known. The Bush administration should be told that the American people do not want business as usual in the savings and loan industry, and that they want the industry to stick to home lending.

I urge all Members to ask their constituents what they want done with the industry, and I urge all Americans to let Congress and the administration know whether they support risky savings and loan investments or the Annunzio plan, which will return the industry to its traditional role of home lending.

THE SPREAD OF BALLISTIC MISSILES CONTINUES UNABATED

(Mr. BERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to deliver a warning about a dangerous and destabilizing threat existing not only in the Middle East and Europe, but in our own hemisphere.

Clear evidence exists that a number of countries already possessing chemical weapons—and some seeking nuclear capability—have recently acquired sophisticated ballistic missile equipment and technology.

In their quest for profits, the European companies providing this equipment and technology are courting catastrophe.

Scientists associated with West Germany's largest aerospace firm have played a key role in a joint Argentine, Egyptian, and Iraqi missile program. There are reports that an arm of the Italian company, Fiat, has also contributed vital components to this missile system.

To place missiles capable of delivering not only chemical, but nuclear payloads, in the hands of these countries is the height of irresponsibility.

The United States and its major allies agreed years ago to stop cold the spread of ballistic missiles, but it continues unabated. The enforcement provisions created by many countries are utterly ineffective. The administration must make it a top priority to negotiate a more coordinated and efficient deterrent.

PRESIDENT BUSH, VICE PRESIDENT QUAYLE, AND SECRETARY BAKER SHOULD DECIDE WHAT OUR POLICY IS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, potentially in Central America it appears there are two big steps that might lead to peace. In essence, rebel leaders in El Salvador and in Nicaragua would lay down their arms in exchange for elections. But the Bush administration could help by getting their act together on what our policy is and getting their foreign policy team in place. At the same time that Secretary Baker says that he supports a negotiated settlement in Central America, Vice President QUAYLE denounces the accord by the Central American Presidents in Nicaragua.

Granted it has been tough negotiating with rebel Marxists in El Salvador and with the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. Negotiations with them in many cases have been fruitless. But what is the alternative? It is important that we have a set policy, a bipartisan policy, but it is also important that the administration speak with one voice.

That is not happening. While everybody wants to extend a honeymoon and a bipartisan arm to the Bush administration, it is important that we know who we are dealing with and what policy we are negotiating with.

It is important that their team be in place. It is not happening in this critical region of the world and it is important that Secretary Baker, Vice President QUAYLE, and the President of the United States decide what our policy is going to be and speak with one voice.

FARMERS AND THE ENVIRONMENT TO BENEFIT FROM DECISION ON MEETING AIR QUALITY STANDARDS

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud a recent decision by the Atlantic Richfield Co. [ARCO] to begin blending ethanol in its gasoline in order to meet air quality standards in Arizona. ARCO should be commended for recognizing the tremendous environmental benefits derived from the use of ethanol and should serve as a model for other gasoline manufacturers to follow.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, oxygenated fuels such as ethanol represent the most cost effective and environmentally sound public policy option available for the more than 90 cities that have been determined to be in nonattainment of EPA air standards. Consider these facts:

EPA has determined that the use of ethanol blends will reduce motor vehicle emissions of carbon monoxide by approximately 25 to 30 percent.

Because of the reduction in carbon monoxide which is a precursor to ozone, ethanol-blended fuels should also result in reduced formation of urban ozone.

Ethanol can replace harmful aromatic hydrocarbon fuel additives such as benzene, toulene, and xylene which have serious health effects and are the worst contributors to the ozone problem.

While the environment clearly will benefit from ARCO's decision to blend ethanol, ARCO will benefit as well by marketing a high performance, high octane motor fuel. In announcing its decision, the vice president of ARCO Products Co. said:

Blending ethanol with our gasoline will provide motorists with a fuel that produces no discernible difference in a car's driveability. Some motorists may even notice a slight improvement in car performance, since ethanol increases gasoline octane.

Farmers will also benefit from this decision. ARCO will market an estimated 5 million gallons of ethanol in Phoenix over the next year. That amount is about equal to the annual production of an ethanol plant in my State of North Dakota, that uses grain grown by local farmers. ARCO's decision will mean more demand for ethanol, and more demand for grain. That's good for farmers and good for the U.S. Government, because higher grain prices mean lower Government farm program costs.

Again, Mr. Speaker, ARCO should be commended for its decision to be part of the solution to our serious air pollution problems. And I would like to challenge other major oil companies to follow suit. The sooner all U.S. oil companies recognize that they have a responsibility to help in the fight against air pollution—the sooner we will breathe clean air.

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT: THINGS ARE NOT IMPROVING

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COELHO). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when Ronald Reagan left town he boarded a jet and headed off to California to retire. And one of the last things he told us as he left Washington, DC, was that the Federal budget deficit was getting much, much better—things were improving. Well, it is a message that is not dissimilar from the message that we heard from ex-President Reagan for the years that he served here in Washington, DC. In fact, things are not improving, they are getting worse.

I would like to talk to you about one of the reasons why that is the case. President Reagan said he is going to spend his remaining time now trying to convince the American people to amend the U.S. Constitution so that we prevent future budget deficits. In other words, a balanced budget amendment.

He says that without even a grin. I would expect somebody whose budgets recommended $1.2 trillion in deficits—as his budgets recommended—I would expect somenone who recommended that to at least grin a little when he says he wants the American Constitution to protect the American people from that kind of behavior in the future.

At any rate, he proposed major deficits all the way along when he was President, and as he left town he said, "Things are getting much better." They are not. Let me describe why.

In 1983, the Congress took a major step to put the Social Security system back on solid footing. Social Security financing was in desperate trouble. We in the Committee on Ways and Means initiated the action on the Social Security reform bill. It meant more money would come into the system. It meant that we trimmed a few of the benefits like the student benefit and others. It meant that we put things back on track. We also decided we had to save for a rainy day because when the biggest baby crop in the history of America, the baby boomers retire after the turn of the century, we will have maximum strain on that system. For that reason, we had to save in the Social Security system, and we are beginning to accumulate that kind of savings.

In this coming fiscal year, there will be $68 billion more coming into the Social Security system than is going out. That is a reserve that we specifically dedicated to be used after the turn of the century for the baby boomers who retire. Now what is happening to that reserve? Well, under Gramm-Rudman, a budget fraud in my judgment, but under Gramm-Rudman they take that reserve, the surplus in the Social Security system next year of $68 billion, and compare it to all of the other spending and reduce the stated deficit in the operating budget. This means that, although the deficit next year is going to be well over $160 billion, Ronald Reagan was able to stand up and say, "Here is my budget, my friends, and it has good news. The budget shows a deficit of only $92 billion." The reason the budget shows only a deficit of $92 billion is that he took the $68 billion in Social Security surplus which we raised for a very specific purpose—to be used out in the outyears when we will need it—he took it and reduced the budget deficit with the Social Security surplus. That allowed him to say things are getting much better, when in fact they are not, they are getting worse.

We need to do something about that. Congresswoman OAKAR and I have introduced legislation in the House of Representatives, H.R. 933, which many of my colleagues have cosponsored, and I hope many more will cosponsor, to take the Social Security system out of the Gramm-Rudman budget calculations. Social Security has nothing to do with and should have nothing to do with the deficit as reported in this fiscal system of ours.

The Social Security system is now running a very big surplus for a very special reason. We need that surplus in the outyears. We should not misuse that surplus as Gramm-Rudman does to try and show a depressed Federal budget deficit. Let us be honest about the operating budget. If it is out of balance, let us restrain spending and raise revenue to put it back in balance and put the fiscal policy back on track, but let us not take from the Social Security system, let us not take the money that we had the courage to raise in the 1980's from that system, because we are going to need that money after the turn of the century.

The current scheme allows the administration to say things are getting better when they are not. It injures the Social Security system. It misleads the American people on fiscal policy and is flat out dishonest budgeting in my judgment. I hope that this House will move expeditiously to get rid of this problem.

In 1983 I offered the amendment in the Committee on Ways and Means that said if we are going to raise this money that we need, let us take Social Security out of the unified budget. The Committee on Ways and Means passed that amendment, but before they passed it, a colleague of mine who was, at that time, chairman of the Committee on the Budget, amended my amendment and said that is a good idea but a good idea in 1993, not today. So my amendment is now the law but does not take effect until 1993, and Gramm-Rudman came along and fused the revenues of Social Security to the operating deficit, and as a result, is now allowing an administration to show a budget deficit figure that is completely out of touch with reality.

My feeling is the House should begin to take action. To do so would be fair to the senior citizens of this country who rely on and expect the Social Security system to be there when they retire. To do so would be important for fiscal policy as well, and I commend it to my colleagues and hope they would cosponsor House bill 933.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF SPEAKER JIM WRIGHT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity and the use of special orders in order to address what I consider to be, and history inescapably will record as a rather shameful if not downright inexcusable period in the history of evolvement of the U.S.

House of Representatives. It has to do with what I will entitle my remarks today, as the attempted assassination of Speaker JIM WRIGHT.

In politics, at least in American politics, it has been my observation as a man who did not intend to be in politics until later, relatively speaking, and after the war, that the credibility, in other words, the integrity of an individual is paramount. We live in a day and time of imagemaking and propelling, and we have been for about 14 years or more, perhaps, really going back to the Presidential election of 1972, the awesome power and ability of those, who through either great resources or direct or indirect control of the means of disseminating what is called news or otherwise information to the American citizens, and knowing full well that in a democracy where we pride ourselves in the ability to govern ourselves, it is absolutely essential, critically essential, that the citizen be informed so he can in the light of his full knowledge as is obtainable, render his decision, which even though it may be reduced in the minds of some of my fellow Americans to a rather insignificant duty of voting, it should be realized that that is the most significant duty of free-born Americans in the discharge of this endeavor upon which our Nation is founded in the faith that we can govern ourselves.

Therefore, our institutions and the integrity of the institutional forces are equally vital as the integrity of each and every one of us as we go about discharging a public trust in a democracy. Holding public office is indeed holding public trust. Once credibility is gone, I feel it is just a matter of time in our system before that individual loses out, but we live in a day and time, as I say, of image making, of propelling images, particularly during our domestic political considerations.

So that so-called elections in the last couple of decades turned out to be contests between what in England, before 1832, were known as public office jobbers and what in the crumbling stages of the Roman Empire were known indeed as jobbers of public offices, where a public office had a price and the would-be aspirant, if he could outmatch his competitors in the amount of money he could obtain, was able to win the seat. This was true in England until the Reform Act of 1832.

Today, in America our modern-day job brokers are these tremendously high-priced so-called PR firms or opinion-molding agencies. And being that our society, not just in the United States but throughout the world, is living in a very different period of time than that in which our parents and grandparents lived, it becomes absolutely indispenable that we have freedom of access to objective and verifiable news reporting and, in the electoral processes, access to any American who under the Constitution qualifies for these offices.

In that case it means that any male or female of 25 years of age as a minimum in any given State who is a citizen of that State, the only specific qualifications being that he or she be a citizen of that State and be at least 25 years of age, may be able and should be able to seek election to the U.S. Congress, that is, to the House of Representatives. In the case of the U.S. Senate, the candidate should be at least 30 years of age and also a citizen of that State. There are no other qualifications. It does not say that you qualify if you own x amount of property or have x number of college degrees.

The reason for that is obvious. The reason is that the Founders of our Government, those who envisioned and wrote the Constitution, wanted to make sure that indeed and in fact the Preamble of the Constitution had meaning and significance. That is, it says, "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union." It did not say, "We the Congress," or "I, the President," or "We the judges of the courts." It says, "We the people," and this is the ultimate sovereign.

So when we go before our constituents today, what that means is that in the average contest for the U.S. Congress, for instance, in the State of Texas, one can lose with the expenditure of almost a quarter of a million dollars. To win, it takes far more, with few exceptions. I am talking about the median average. And this is even more startling when we look at the national average.

As to the ado about the organizations known as political action committees and who is behind them, I do not know how much difference it would make. I have had the great honor and opportunity of serving in a representative capacity from the lowest level of a legislative body to the State level and to the national level now for almost 28 years, and I have seen all the contortions entered into in trying to perfect a so-called ethics bill or a so-called piece of standards of conduct legislation. I remember that that was the big issue when I got elected to the State Senate of Texas, and I remember then the contortions and the maneuverings and the final product, which anybody could have said would be the result. If it takes a person 25 years of age to know the difference between right and wrong, I do not know that there is any law that any political or legislative body can pass to instruct him in those basic principles.

In the case which the newspapers now report will be soon ready for reporting by the so-called Ethics Committee, otherwise known as the Committee on Official Standards of Conduct, with respect to the allegations and the unbelievable political motivation behind those allegations, principally those insisted upon during a passionate period of the election campaign last year by our colleague from Georgia, and which, in addition, had the impulse of others, but principally and mostly because of the insistence of our colleague from Georgia, we have now had this great attempt to smear, to destroy forever the integrity, the character, and the reputation of a man who has proven his worth for more than 35 years in the Congress, and before that, serving on a local level as the mayor of his hometown and as a representative in the State Legislature of Texas. I will say this to my collegues—and I think they know it—if at any time a man or a woman, given this period of experience of going before an electorate time after time, standing review and reaching the preeminence of having been elected by his peers on the majority side unanimously as Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, the odds are that it would have to take an overwhelming weight of evidence, a preponderance of evidence, in order to smudge even a tiny bit the integrity and character of a great public servant and, if you please, a magnificent leader, one who assumed this post in a most difficult time of institutional erosion in the processes of the U.S. House of Representatives.

In my opinion—and I have said this since then—we have seen emanating since the efforts of the so-called Legislative Reform Act of 1974 and the creation of such things as our presession organizational caucuses and the like, perhaps with the best of intentions, something that was done and that was sold as something that would be fixed in concrete, that would last forever. But all we have to do is read the proceedings and the record of proceedings of the year 1947, in the postwar period, and the Legislative Reform Act of 1947 to see how cyclical this thing is.

But here the allegations were pressed, and astoundingly no particular rules of procedure were set forth, and it was bound to be as I pointed out when we had the discussion on the creation of this committee, on which I dissented for the same reasons I am now reaffirming in the light of experience, and dramatically illustrated by this attempted assassination, because in my book, in our American system, an elected public official may be assassinated by a bullet, but to me it is equally as serious and devastating and as deadly a blow as being shot to have one's character assassinated or at least to have even the attempt made. For who can remove the cloud that has already enveloped since the committee saw fit under very questionably circumstances, in my opinion to undertake an investigation which will cost over a million and a quarter, close to another million dollars?

Here I am, a newly elected chairman of an historical and fundamental committee known as the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, ready to appear before the House Administration Committee tomorrow to seek justice for a budget that was decimated as of October 1. It was not until a week after I was elected chairman of this committee that I discovered that as of October 1 last year the committee had lost $300,000 of its budget, the reason for that being that my predecessor chairman had turned back that amount unused.

Why? I do not know. I was not privy to the reasons. Nor were any Members, as far as I know, other than perhaps some who may have been in privity with the then chairman. Certainly I was not.

I discovered further that the predecessor chairman had not bothered to fill six fundamental slots including the office of chief counsel for the committee at a time when this committee is on the cutting edge of the most serious and the most apprehensive of issues that we have not seen the like of in five decades, 50 years.

Now, I go to this committee to ask them to give me what? A budget that will amount to the same as the ethics committee will have spent fruitlessly, motivated on the basic charge that was politically and insidiously inspired. There cannot be any other reason or motive.

Why do I say that? For the simple reason that the charges upon which this committee has based its decision to look into this are unsupported by any sworn affidavits. This is the reason I argued against the creation of the committee at the time. This is a reason I argued against, after its creation, at the time of the so-called Tongsun Park, or whatever he was, scandals and, subsequent to that, the so-called Abscam scandals, the resolutions that were necessary for us to pass, they said, in order for the so-called ethics committee to look into that.

My question then, which was never answered and I repeat it today is: "Why do you need resolutions subsequent to this to go into each and every case when you had a rule setting up this committee that should have given you all the power?" What was the case before? Why is it that since 1789, on the occasion of the First Congress 200 years ago and since then, until 1974, no prior Congress had seen fit to get into that bramble patch? Could have been a good reason, I believe, but nobody bothered to ask because a Congress then, as now, was cowed by the chorus of press, radio, television denunciations making it look as if the wrongdoing of a few was the wrongdoing of many.

Now I do not blame the press, I do not blame the lobbyists, I do not blame anybody but ourselves. If we allow ourselves to be cowed and succumb to surrendering and abdicating higher constitutional trust that is placed by the supreme law of the land, the law of the land on our shoulders, once we accept to seek and to take these offices, and in every one of the allegations that this committee saw fit to honor and dignify, which I would not have even have put in the waste basket, there was not one allegation that was anything but a regurgitation of newspaper and magazine articles, some of which had been written 15 years ago, long before there was a gleam in the Speaker's eye of becoming Speaker. However now to sit here and say, "Well, maybe something ought to be done in the way of this, that and the other," I say it is time for us to regain our wits before it is too late.

I will say this to my colleague from Georgia: "You have set in motion a most destructive process. You have planted the seeds of the eventual destruction of this body and the system that it represents and symbolizes, representative government."

I might say to my colleagues that the record will show, because I have not spoken in retrospect, and all I am saying is what I have said on the record on the occasion of the so-called exclusion resolution of Adam Clayton Powell. There were a few of us that stood up and said, "We don't have that power. If you want to impeach this gentleman, do so, and then we will give you serious consideration." But those who wanted to kick out Mr. Powell, who had been duly elected; his election was not in question; he was overwhelmingly elected. It was his alleged and reported misdoings, so it is clear in both the precedents, as well as in the Constitution, as well as in those of the House that, when one speaks of excluding a Member who otherwise has been legally elected, one is tampering with the inherent well-being and purgeability of this institution, for in eras of passionate political feeling throughout the country a Member who happens to be unpopular because of his utterances, or his political identification, or maybe his religious creed, could easily be set upon and exluded even though his constituents elected him.

We said that on the record, but, oh, no, the then minority leader led the fight. He was able to get enough of the majority to go along because Adam Clayton Powell's name was in the press daily. Maybe he was guilty. But there were processes in our system set up for that in the Constitution, and that was impeachment.

However the trouble with that, and I told then the minority leader later, or Vice President, and later President, "The trouble is you gentlemen don't want to come with an impeachment resolution because you have to have a bill of particulars, as it is called in law, a bill of particulars which says that Mr. Adam Clayton Powell on such and such a day did sin and do wrong in this way and that."

"Oh, no. Let us exclude him."

So, the House voted. Mr. Speaker, I got on this floor and said, "The moment this gets to the court it will be determined that Mr. Adam Clayton Powell was wrongly excluded from membership in the House of Representatives." Indeed and in fact it was not too many months after that that the Supreme Court indeed so ruled and reaffirmed a long corpus of lawful precedents as well as affirmed congressional procedure and constitutional mandates.

However, the problem there was that, if that has been allowed to prevail, we would eventually have reached the point where we could have had the dissolution of this body such as has happened in other unhappy lands where the parliamentary system quite never has taken root.

Now we come to this, a sorry episode tragic in its dimensions, unfortunate in its ultimate consequences for the main and simple reason, that, if any can come and pillory any one of us and without unsupported evidence to show any wrongdoing, which the accuser himself said at the very beginning, "Oh, I doubt there's any actionable material here," then what does that revert to? It reverts to: How did the Congresses do it before?

Mr. Speaker, I will tell and I will repeat to my colleagues what I said then at the time the matter was being considered as to whether or not we should constuct such a thing as a Committee on Official Standards of Conduct. I pointed out that these matters had been under a subcommittee of investigation in Judiciary. Why Judiciary? Because by its very nature this procedure will become adversarial. My colleagues will have a charge, and my colleagues will have an answer. We have our tremendous tradition of Anglo-Saxon judicial precedents of freedom and equal justice before the courts.

Maybe we have lost some of it, but we still subscribe to it. We are still basically as free born Americans wedded to that fundamental principle. Why should we abandon it in the U.S. House of Representatives? Why should any Member, much less the Speaker, be confronted with this painful, and I am sure to him many hours of pained hurt, as well as to those who love him, as well as to those who respect and follow him and respect him for good reason and who would be the first to denounce were he to have strayed from the fundamental paths of rectitude and probity.

So I do not care what the so-called Committee on Official Standards of Conduct, otherwise known as Ethics, comes up with. I deplore that it did not erect the prerequisites of time-honored requirements that a man is innocent until proven guilty.

For good reason that Subcommittee on Investigations had ignored and discarded hundreds, dozens of occasions in which similar attempts had been made—but why? Because if I had a complaint and I wanted to to to that Committee on Investigations to complain against wrongdoing on the part of a colleague, I would have to get a sworn affidavit with documentation supportiung it.

This is not done, my fellow Members of the U.S. House of Representatives.

It is easy, the Irish say, to sleep on another man's wounds.

Let me tell you, though, we have joined in holding that dagger of assassination, and let me tell you how. It is best exemplified by what one of the most incisive articles published in the United States, the Economist of London says under its general section of "American Survey." "So much for romance" is the title of the article. It is from the February 11 of this year issue. I am going to read the pertinent paragraphs so that they will be in the RECORD. I will not introduce the entire article, for I feel that most of it would the extraneous to the point I am trying to make to date:

Congressmen are funny people. They hitched their pay to that of the more popular civil servants (judges, scientists and the like), appointed a commission to recommend a rise for these worthies, worked out a strategy for avoiding a vote on the commission's recommendations, and then—scared by the rage of constituents stirred up by radio disc jockeys—demanded a chance to vote against the pay rise, hoping their demands would be ignored. But the Speaker of the House could not stand the heat and allowed a vote.

I pause at that point to interject this observation, which the reporter, obviously 6,000 miles away did not realize, and that is that the Speaker sent each and every one of us when the alarums became strident, and he asked us simply, "What is your desire? What do you want, fellows? I want to have an idea. I don't want to embarrass anybody. I have had groups and individuals come before me now in private.

"Now, what is it you want? You don't even have to sign your name to the interrogatory. Send it anonymously, if you wish, but I want to have an idea."

And what happened? He was denounced by some of us—not I, but some of my colleagues—and then finally he allowed the very vote that everyone was telling the people, "Oh, by golly, I wouldn't do any such thing without a vote."

And then what happened? Did the House vote on the issue of the pay raise? No; but reading the newspapers you would think we had. We voted on a motion to table the resolution that called for the pay raise. That means we did not even want to debate it, did not even want to offer amendments or changes or modifications.

"Oh, let's not talk about it. Hey, not me, but though, secretly, yes, I think I ought to vote for it."

So here is this mordant Brit telling us which way they see it.

The majority voted against a rise they secretly favoured. The judges, scientists and civil servants were thus done out of their rise, and the congressmen all blamed the Speaker for letting them take the vote they had demanded. Mr. Jim Wright's reputation, already under siege from an ethics committee investigating some of his deeds, sank even further.

I say that when we engage in a paltry politically motivated vendetta, and in my book, assassination attempt, we are in effect sticking the dagger in our own individual hearts. If this momentum continues, and let us say there is a reversal and then some of the majority decides they are going to take after some of the minority on such dubious premises as those that the gentleman from Georgia presented to the committee, can we not see no end? Can we not see that it is never too late to correct an error, that it is time that this House that thought it was washing its hands of this guilt, of protecting the guilty, and therefore would create this committee without any real charge, any real framework of reference, legal or otherwise?

I think it is time for us to recall that, disassemble this poorly constructed committee and revert to the system that worked and place it in the committee that should have it to begin with, which has the duty of the impeachment process and the like. That is where it ought to go. Then we can be at least assured that the Members because of their qualifications to belong to the Judiciary Committee will not be acting either out of ignorance or with a maximum of bias and malice, but that we will have time-honored principles which we hold for every single American citizen in proceedings in which we have an accuser and an accused, not shred from the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives the basic rights that we as free born Americans demand for ourselves who may not be members of this or any other publicly elective office.

I say one thing further, because this is another reason. I noticed last year when we began to have the so-called FSLIC or the savings and loan crisis that the gentleman from Georgia added that to one of his charges against Speaker WRIGHT.

I was amazed when so little was said by those who took part in the transactions at the time when the 1986 so-called FSLIC recapitalization bill was passed by this House.

Therefore, I feel it incumbent upon myself, charged with knowledge, to here and now place in the RECORD the role of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT]. Here is why: I do not know where the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] was on the so-called FSLIC bailout then. I do not know that he took any part to denounce in prospectus that there would be great dilemmas facing us. Some of us did from the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. I was the only one who went to the Committee on Rules and argued against what turned out to be the Garn-St Germain bill; that was on October 1, 1982. I gave reasons. I also predicted.

The next day, because the House was in the mood, it wanted to quit before the election. It was an election year: 1982. On October 2, late-early evening, or late afternoon, the confernce report was brought up, later to be labeled as the Garn-St Germain bill, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] came to me, and he said, "HENRY, are you going to speak against this?" He said, "I have been having so many calls from the independent bankers who feel that this legislation that is being rushed is bad." I said, "Well, JIM, I did yesterday. I went before the Committee on Rules, and it was very, very tenuous for me, it was almost embarrassing, it was uncomfortable," because here I had my chairman of my committee going to the Committee on Rules, and then I, and only I, following him and contradicting what he was saying. I said, "So I feel that it would be fruitless for me to come on the House floor and repeat what I have already in vain thought was the only thing I could do effectively." I said, "In my opinion, Mr. Leader," and he was the majority leader then, "this thing," the way I put it, I said, "the skids are greased," and sure enough.

Mr. Speaker, I want the RECORD to show, and I hope all of the accusers who have tried to smear the Speaker on this issue would read the RECORD for October 2, 1982, and see the position of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] on that and why he was taking it. He was not defending any S&L in Texas or anywhere else. He was on target. He was right. He should be shown that he was right, and that the RECORD reveals that he was right.

WRIGHT was right, and it is on the record.

It was not what he was saying in secret. But what happened? I did not see anybody on my left on the minority or in the majority for that matter get up and say, "We ought to have a vote on this. We ought to be recorded." It went through on a voice vote at about 10 p.m., and the only reason it got to 10 p.m. was because the then majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], got up and took the floor and denounced that legislation, and others after that followed him, but not until he had spoken.

I think this is one clear example where enough is enough, and where I plead with my colleagues to stand on one and both sides; if because of partisan false solidarity my colleagues on the minority side do not have the courage to stand up to the false accusers and the politically malicious accusers, then it behooves us on the majority side, and I say let us call it for what it is. I say not attempt it, because once these things fly and they are printed all over, and by those who to begin with are professional Congress-haters anyway and others, every one of us for whatever reason has people who do not like us.

Mr. Speaker, I am sensitive to this, because I have survived. In fact, I am here today because I survived the first assault, a malicious attempt to frame me when I was on the city council, and being considered alone and helpless, in the words of the then city attorney, "We are going to scare that little Mexican off the city council to wish he had never heard of the city council," and then astoundingly through the collusion of one of the daily local papers, they had a banner headline on the day the man raised these false accusations. They thought, "That will scare him." After all, the council paid no money, $20 a week for 40 weeks. Of course, it was expected, but when I found myself involved in what we call politics, that is, seeking political elective office, one thing I made up my mind, that no matter how much it was reported that politicians were open season, I would never permit an untruthful assault on my integrity and my reputation and my word, for it has been unsullied. It was before, and it has been since.

I have actually also had more than just verbal assassination attempts. I have had actual physical attempts. I have had attempts reported by the FBI itself, and then the FBI clamming up and refusing to give me a report, their report being based on personalities that the captain of the homicide division of the San Antonio Police Department told me were capable, fully capable, of carrying out the hit or the contract, which is what the FBI reported to me, and then it took 3, 4, 5 years before I could get any kind of satisfaction from this great, august body known as the FBI. I know what it is.

Mr. Speaker, I want the Speaker to know, and I think I speak for every single member of the Texas delegation, Mr. Speaker, we continue, and will always have, utmost faith and respect for your character, you reputation, and your integrity, and I, for one, pledge myself to fight and resist any attempts of willful, malicious, and premeditated assaults on that character.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

REMARKS OF GOV. MARIO M. CUOMO

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues the speech given by New York Governor Mario Cuomo at the Democratic Issues Conference in White Sulphur Springs, WV, in February. While this was a partisan gathering, I believe Mr. Cuomo's remarks should be carefully studied by all lawmakers.

I have attached the speech and encourage you to read it. I am certain that you will agree that we are at a pivotal point in the history of our Nation. We must accept this challenge as we strive to make a difference for our constituents and the Nation.

REMARKS BY GOV. MARIO M. CUOMO AT HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS RETREAT

I believe that the inauguration of President Bush has presented a new—perhaps even a surprising—opportunity for congressional Democrats, and for Democrats generally.

But I also think that to seize that opportunity we must first know who we are and what we stand for.

It seems to me that the single most significant challenge to Democrats in 1989 is to make our philosophy of Government clear, consistent and compelling, and to demonstrate our confidence that this philosophy can be translated into a better way . . . a better life for all Americans.

I reject the suggestion that because of our failure to win the Presidency again, we should abandon some of our principal convictions only to adopt a new philosophy that sounds more like the campaign language of those who defeated us. I think clearly Harry Truman was right: "When a Republican runs against a Republican, a Republican always wins."

I doubt, frankly, that this country would, for long, follow a philosophical wanderer, or a reed shaken by the wind. That's not what the country wants.

When our principles as Democrats become too vague to give direction, too uncertain to give confidence, then we will lose our form, we will lose our identity . . . and we will lose our effectiveness.

Besides sureness, the people must find in our philosophy, I think, two other qualities.

We must be progressive, in that we seek constantly to improve the quality of life by continually adapting to changing circumstances. And we must be pragmatic; what we propose must work, and it must make common sense to most people.

Your new approach to welfare last year is an excellent illustration of that kind of progressive pragmatism.

At our best as Democrats, we have been all of these things.

We have always begun with the same kind of strong belief in the intelligence of affirmative, positive government that Lincoln articulated with these words, they're familiar to you, I'm sure:

"The legitimate object of Government is to do for the people what needs to be done, but which they cannot, by individual effort, do at all, or do so well, for themselves. There are many such things . . .," Lincoln said.

As we have proven many times, we believe that government's first obligation is to defend us against attacks from without. So we will maintain whatever forces are needed, and we will do what we must to deter foreign enemies or to defeat those we cannot deter.

And we know that means we must pay for a strong, modern defense, but we also know that we should work toward international understandings which could reduce the cost of military preparedness to all sides. That seems fundamental to us.

We believe that we must defend ourselves at home as well. We do that by insisting on firm enforcement of the rule of law, which is the miracle that keeps this democracy together. That rule of law which protects us against both the criminals who would threaten our lives and property, and a government that would threaten our constitutional rights.

We believe one of the best things government can help produce is what many of our forbears came here for, certainly mine—a chance to earn their own bread, and maybe a little more, with dignity. We insist as Democrats that all who can work for their subsistence, should work.

We believe that a free enterprise economy is the best means of creating the opportunities and the wealth to meet our needs. But we've never pretended that government has no role in that economy. Government is vital to assure that our economy operates fairly and honestly. And government should help those with willingness and ability to go as far as they can.

We advocate the politics of inclusion, believing that those of us who have been blessed and have succeeded should be expected to contribute reasonably—through our Government—to those who have not been able to provide for themselves in the free market economy, because they're too young, or they're too old, or they're too frail—or simply because we have not yet made a place for them in that economy.

We recognize a particular role for government today in helping us restore our strength and agility in the intensified global competition. How? By dealing with ur deficit, by stabilizing our currency, by regularizing and making fairer our trade relations, by encouraging investment instead of consumption, by encouraging research and development, by making our education sounder, and tougher, and more relevant.

Cherishing our gift of freedom to think and believe as we choose, we have always fought unnecessary government intrusion into our private lives.

At the same time, we encourage government to promote aggressively the consensus values that mark us as civilized in a uniquely American way. Values like: Respect for the rights of others; an awarenes of the profound ways in which we are all equal; reverence for the individual rights that issue from that equality; the importance of hard work and individual initiative but the importance, too, of working for a greater good than our individual good—working for a common good.

We know that in a society as complex as ours, all of these things are interrelated and interconnected. Intelligence demands we recognize that:

Our peace and world peace are interconnected.

Our domestic economy and the new world economy.

Our personal prosperity and the common good.

Our freedom and our obligations.

Our values and our vulnerabilities.

As Democrats, we know that the pursuit of our principles requires us to bring together the different parts of the political spectrum, and when that power is divided, as it is now in Washington, we understand that it calls for responsible bipartisanship that understands the difference between compromise in method, and surrender of integrity.

And we know, too, that when the power is divided globally, when it's divided in the world, well then that calls for prudent but aggressive efforts at international cooperation.

These all seem like fundamental truths to us.

In this awfully complex society, we Democrats understand the political desire for clarity, especially in a world where 20-second sound bites are so significant.

But we understand something else. And that is the need for subtlety. So we reject slogans and simplistic labels.

We know you don't have to call yourself a conservative to be for a strong defense, to be against crime, or to be troubled by our national debt and deficit.

And you certainly don't have to call yourself a liberal to have a social conscience to be concerned about a contaminated environment, or to promote conciliation among nations.

We know the difference between ideas that sound good and ideas that are good and sound.

We certainly don't mind a little poetry in campaigns.

But we know that the campaign is over and that laws and budgets are written in prose.

And that prose will now have to describe some realities that were obscured by the earlier poetry.

Now let's consider just some of those realities.

It's true of course that we've achieved economic growth. Some of our people have done well, even very well. We're not involved directly in a war. And I think the arms treaty was a singularly hopeful achievement.

We are still the strongest, freest, greatest Nation on earth and Democrats have helped make us that.

But Democrats know as well, that in the midst of recovery, there's been a retreat—a retreat from the idea of government as a positive force, from the politics of inclusion, from the progressive pragmatism that worked so well for 50 years in this country. Ugly divisions—not seen for a long time—have reappeared among our people.

That retreat has left behind millions more poor; millions more homeless; millions of Americans with no health insurance; millions of Americans who can't read or write; displaced workers without adequate retraining; single parents who want to work but can't find child care; more and more of the middle class torn away from their chance at the American dream.

And all of that is true notwithstanding it wasn't heard as clearly perhaps as it should have been in the campaign.

It's true that for all our power and all of our might, for all of the cheery chauvinism and flagwaving, there is no hiding the fact that this great Nation has serious problems.

A substantial trade deficit; an unprecedented plague of drugs; a spreading lethal contagion called AIDS that has no antidote; a population growing older but not necessarily more secure; a generation of children more fragile and vulnerable than ever before in the history of this place or, for all I know, any industrialized society; an environment threatened by contamination and even gradual suffocation.

And we know that we have not begun to do enough to educate and train the workforce of the 21st century, which will be, in substantial measure—female, black, and Hispanic.

Now, we're not a nation in decline. But unless we make swifter progress than we're making now, much of the rest of the world will soon move past us.

And I think all of this is virtually unarguable.

As a result of all of this, America has rarely been more in need of democratic values and democratic leadership than it is today.

Democrats have always recognized moments like this one. They have always been at their very best in times of challenge.

Franklin Roosevelt lifted this Nation from its knees in 12 years of triumph over despair. Harry Truman brought us from the Second World War to the beginning of a new prosperity. John Kennedy defended our Nation in its perilous moment during the missiles-of-October crisis. Lyndon Johnson refocused the conscience of the Nation on civil rights and social justice. Jimmy Carter rescued us from the moral bankruptcy of Watergate, and advanced human rights abroad, leading to the emergence of democratic movements all around the world.

And so it seems to me from Albany, that what the Nation needs now is what we, as Democrats, have written into our platforms and sung as our party anthem for more than 50 years: an energetically positive government that marries common sense to compassion, and self-interest to our common interest.

A Government that is strong, that reflects the collective fairness, and wisdom and generosity of the people. Indeed, what we need now is a politics that in New York we call, "family." A politics that believes a kinder, gentler nation is the product of the government's efforts to help people share benefits and burdens.

Now that politics requires a lot more than handwringing or nice words written into platform statements.

It will require investment of a considerable amount of wealth.

And we must find that wealth while reducing the largest deficit and debt we have ever had—and without making our defenses vulnerable, and without mortgaging the future inordinately.

It would be simplistic to say it, but I'll say it anyway—it won't be easy. It will mean making hard choices, by limiting spending on some wants, and by providing revenues, somehow, to meet more adequately our needs.

But now here, to me, is the heart of the matter, politically and the surprise:

I think we begin with an advantage that most of us did not expect we would have in a Republican President.

In 1984, at the Democratic National Convention, I tried to say that while President Reagan believed we were all one Glittering, shining city on a hill, there was another city where people were struggling, where people were in pain and dejection.

I believe President Reagan truly never saw that city. And for 8 years he tried to convince America that the other city did not exist. And for 8 years, the voices of people crying for help from that city went largely unheard by those in the city on the hill.

But something has happened.

Perhaps the clouds have been lifted by "a new breeze." Perhaps the cries have grown too loud to be ignored.

Because President George Bush has admitted there is another city.

He has seen it.

He tells us that he has cried over the sight of the hungry children playing in the gutters, where the glitter doesn't show.

He says he has been shaken by the sight of the homeless, trembling in the winter cold.

He has heard the pleas of mothers for child care, and the chance to work.

He has anguished at the prospect of thousands of aids babies, born to die. From the moment of their birth, being able to expect nothing more than perhaps 6 years.

Our new President tells us that "legions of minorities" do not have access to the circle of opportunity, because their education is inadequate, because they have not the skills they need.

And more than that, and more than SDI, and more than the environment, he suggests that Government should help these people.

In fact, ladies, and gentlemen, it seems to me that President Bush has—with stunning swiftness—made a giant step forward toward the truth, and toward progress.

What we as democrats were not able to achieve in 8 years, Mr. Bush has done for us in the first month of his Presidency.

He has clearly said that the Democrats were right: That there was a second city; that it is still there and that it is a place of failed dreams, and disappointed hope and great pain.

I think there should be no concern on the part of Democrats that President Bush will coopt us.

He cannot coopt us; he can only confirm us, and to a great extent he already has.

He has dramatically advanced the cause of all Democrats and all progressives, by candidly rejecting his predecessor's narrow view of life in America.

And for that, we should be grateful. The country should be grateful.

But now comes the rest of the challenge.

Having seen and acknowledged the other city, President Bush can now do one of two things: He can remain—poised, halfway down the hill—content to express his sadness and to pray to the heavens—and do nothing more.

And if that is the President's choice, then we as Demcrats should still be grateful for his having acknowledged the rightness of our concern, but then he will be restored as an unconverted conservative Republican, who has simply earned himself some cheap grace, by reciting a little Democratic poetry.

Democrats know that prayer alone will not be the salvation here: It will take both prayer and good works to bring the cities together.

And we will call upon the President to remember that, I'm sure.

But what if he hears us? What if he does? What if he truly believes as we do? What if he comes down from the shining city and does join us in the mean streets, working with us, side-by-side, with our hands and our hearts, to build the houses, to build the schools, to create the jobs, to provide the care, to clean the environment? To embark in a meaningful way on what he has called his "presidential mission?"

What if he starts modestly by funding fully our McKinney Act for the Homeless? And the bold programs of your drug bill? And the welfare Reform Act that New York is so pleased by?

What if he then tries his flexible freeze for a year, because he feels he has that commitment to the American people—"no taxes." So he tries his flexible freeze for a year. But then finds it's not enough and then agrees, honestly, to raise the revenue we need?

What if—for just one example—he joins us in a real way, with resources, in declaring a National decade of the child—to help the children who brought him to tears?

And what if he makes it a real, targeted, specific commitment to begin a full 10 years of emphasis to fight a disgraceful infant mortality rate; to provide access to adequate Health Care for every child; to provide day care; Head Start for all of the children who need it, not just one out of five; National Liberty Scholarships, not New York Liberty Scholarships, National Liberty Scholarships like the ones we're so proud of, which guarantee that every child who qualifies for college—every child no matter how poor—will be afforded the means to achieve a degree from a good college.

What if President Bush—elected as a conservative Republican—abandons the drip, drip, drip of trickle-down, and the voodoo magic of supply side, and instead helps us find ways to share the benefits and burdens of this great Nation?

What if he admits, finally, that for all their brightness, the thousand points of light have never been enough—that all of the churches, and all of the synagogues, and all of the collection plates, and all of the charities and all of the benefactors, have never been enough—without government—to rebuild the other city?

And what if he then decides to use Government not just to build missiles, and cut capital gains taxes, but to provide the bricks, the stone, the mortar, the resources to build a roadway; a wide and sure and safe roadway—from the other city to the shining city on the hill.

What, then, do we say of President Bush?

One word for sure—"Welcome"!

Then we will say this: "Now he has justified us completely, now he has paid us the ultimate compliment. He has joined us."

We will not call him a Democrat, however, for fear that would embarrass him. And surely it would.

Instead, perhaps, we can call him—if not the great communicator—maybe the great cooperator; a gentle name for a kind, and gentle President.

And then, having been justified and confirmed by the President, we'll all be stronger than before as Democrats. The truth of our principles having been vindicated, our role as a party, it seems to me, will have been made more secure.

Will that be good for George Bush?

Well as a man, certainly: It can't hurt you to do the right thing.

Would it be good for him as a politician? These things I don't understand as well as you do, but I'm not so sure it would help him politically.

Because while we would call George Bush the great cooperator, I'm afraid his former friends in the Republican and conservative parties might call him the great collaborator, because they will know that when he became a de facto Democrat, he, and they, lost their ideological coherence—their ideological identity.

Frankly, maybe I have it wrong, but I don't think it's an easy position for the President.

If he joins us, he loses the identity that won him the presidency. If he refuses to, then by having admitted our description of the country's troubles, he has done an important part of our job, and he has strengthened us to go the rest of the way alone as Democrats.

And if necessary, you can go alone, the rest of the way.

And you would have to, for the good of all of us.

Because it would be a denial of all we believe, if being sure of the problems and the pain, we were to respond weakly or inadequately.

If the President will not, we Democrats must demonstrate the strength and confidence in ourselves, as a Nation—to provide the programs and the means and the revenues that will allow us to meet the demands of a whole new era of challenge and possibility.

And we can do it by using our power in both Houses, led by Jim Wright and George Mitchell, to produce the solid programs that we need and to make them realistic by funding them adequately.

And then we Democrats could present the President with the solutions to the problems that he has described so eloquently.

And when you present him with those solutions, would it not be difficult for the President to say "no"—because he would have to then say "no" to those children, and to those homeless, and to those parents, and to those seekers of opportunity—after having shed tears for them and offered prayers for them.

In the end, ladies and gentlemen, it seems to me from Albany that this is a moment of extraordinary opportunity for the Democrats, as long as we remember what we have been, at our best, what we are and what we must be.

We are off to a good start. What we believe as Democrats has been vindicated by the people who have given us control of both Houses of Congress.

And the man chosen to be our President—after having tried it another way for a long time—has begun talking like one of us. We should make the most of it, for the good of the whole country.

Knowing you, I'm sure we will.

Thank you very much for listening.

WARFARE, POLITICS, AND FAMINE IN THE SUDAN

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today I join several colleagues from the House and from the other body in sponsoring a resolution that addresses the acute humanitarian crisis affecting the people of the Sudan. My colleagues and I are joined not by politics but by a common and a deepening concern for the plight of many thousands of Sudanese civilians who are suffering an unimaginable horror as a result of the political dissent and civil war which divides their country. Hundreds of thousands of Sudanese face an imminent peril of starvation—a fate which has already claimed the lives of great numbers of Sudanese people. I urge all Members of this body to sponsor the resolution and more importantly, I urge my colleagues to reflect on the nature and the extent of this tragedy which has no origin in drought or disaster but, instead, stems from political division.

Additional evidence surfaces almost daily documenting the harsh reality that the parties to the political and military conflict in the Sudan—the Government, the militias allied with the Government, the rebels of the SPLA [Sudanese People's Liberation Army] locked in a long-term struggle against the Government—are all only too willing to use food as a weapon in that conflict. Consequently, several million residents of the southern regions of the country have been displaced from their homes, their farms, their livelihoods.

As many as 1 million Sudanese have starved to death since the struggle began in 1983. The toll in 1988 alone exceeded a quarter of million people. This is a remarkable statistic: 250,000 or more noncombatants died last year in the southern regions of the Sudan from starvation or from the infectious diseases which preyed upon the malnourished victims of the warfare. A large percentage of those who died were children. In several displaced persons camps in the Sudan, there are no children under age 3 present—the infants and young children have all died from starvation or epidemic.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR FAMINE

There is no shortage of those who share the blame for this outrage. The rebel forces have blown up relief convoys and shot down planes sent by donor organizations and committed additional utterly indefensible acts which have effectively precluded relief agencies from reaching those in desperate need. The Government of the Sudan has erected barrier upon barrier to deny food and medical relief to those of questionable political affiliation. Relief agencies have been expelled by the Government, permission to launch relief operations denied, resources available for hungry civilians have been diverted to the military.

Indicative of this callous indifference to the plight of hungry southerners is the condition of the million plus displaced who have sought refuge in and around Khartoum, the capital city. In Khartoum, the Government cannot claim that the SPLA interferes with relief efforts or that the displaced are otherwise inaccessible. But in Khartoum the displaced live in the most wretched existence conceivable, many encamped on garbage dumps, most without adequate water, all without sufficient food, medicine, and shelter. The Government does little for these people and limits what the international community is allowed to do.

The independent militias of the Sudan, armed by the Government supposedly to fight the rebel forces, maraud the countryside, robbing, stealing, and burning villages. The militias capture children who are systematically sold into slavery. Based on tribal or religious affiliation, civilians, sometimes the entire population of villages, are summarily executed.

It is also important to note that the international community's stance in face of this expanding tragedy in the Sudan has been less than courageous at times. The Sudan traditionally has been the largest recipient of United States foreign assistance in sub-Saharan Africa but only recently, and only in the face of strong congressional and media criticism, has the State Department felt compelled to speak out against the Government's actions which preclude effective relief. Our European allies, all with considerable influence in the Sudan, have been similarly silent.

AN END TO SILENCE

But we can be silent no longer. It is imperative that there be no doubt concerning the policies of the United States Government in regards to the horrible famine stalking the Sudan. We cannot accept the use of food as a political weapon by any party. We cannot remain silent when innocent children are dying as a result of conflict not of their making or comprehension. We cannot accept the notion that some people are beyond reach or that the situation is too complicated. We must redouble efforts to honor longstanding American humanitarian traditions which require that no options are overlooked, no avenues left unexplored, as we strive to guarantee that no more of these children starve to death.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.

COSTLY S&L ACCOUNTING

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday in this space I criticized the proposed financing scheme for the S&L bailout. I also inserted a timely article from yesterday's Wall Street Journal.

I take this opportunity to bring a second article on the topic to the attention of my colleagues. It is from Thursday's Washington Post and is by Kathleen Day. The message is much the same; if we hide the bailout by resorting to off-budget financing, we raise the cost of the bailout significantly, and I think unnecessarily.

And the taxpayer will pay this added cost because, under the administration's proposal, the Treasury pays the interest on the bonds issued by a newly-created off-budget shell agency. We are already hearing rosy scenarios about the added interest costs, that is, the premium the marketplace will extract for our not financing this Government program through normal Treasury borrowing. I've been in the security business all my adult life, and I see no credible reason why this particular issue will not require a premium over the Treasury rate. As far as I'm concerned a premium of a single basis point is too much.

Finally, and precisely because of the added premium, off-budget financing also produces an unnecessary windfall to the purchasers of the bailout bonds.

The article follows:

WHITE HOUSE RAISES S&L BAILOUT ESTIMATE

(By Kathleen Day)

The government's estimate of the cost of bailing out the savings and loan industry over the next decade jumped again yesterday to $157 billion, 25 percent higher than the projection the White House issued just two weeks ago.

Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady told the Senate Banking Committee that the government will have to spend $114 billion during the next 10 years to close or merge hundreds of ailing S&Ls and another $43 billion in interest payments on that debt.

The escalating numbers underscore the confusion that has surrounded the issue since Bush said two weeks ago that his plan would cost $90 billion and a few days later amended that to $126 billion over 10 years. Lawmakers say they are concerned that Treasury has used overly optimistic economic assumptions to make its estimate, a concern that has been heightened by the agency's piecemeal release of information showing how it performed the arithmetic.

Brady defended the Bush plan to Republican and Democratic critics who said it is inadequate to clean up the current mess and to have enough money left over to create a new fund to insure S&L deposits.

Officials from the Treasury and the Office of Management and Budget would not release a 30-year estimate of the cost of the bailout disagreeing over whether the government has prepared such a projection. But lawmakers released their own 30-year estimate, with Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) putting it at $200 billion and House Banking Committee Chairman Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.) pegging it at $335 billion.

Brady repeated the administration's claim that taxpayers will pay no more than $40 billion of the $157 billion. But Heinz and Gonzalez estimated the taxpayer part of the bailout could triple or quadruple once interest payments over 30 years are counted.

"Clearly, the administration's plan is based on a number of assumptions that are, at best, rosy," Gonzalez said.

He said the Bush plan, which calls for borrowing at least $50 billion over 30 years, will cost the government $138 billion in interest payments that could be avoided if the bailout were funded directly through the Treasury within a few years. The Bush administration is trying to avoid direct funding, partly to force the industry to pay as much as possible of the bailout and partly to avoid a massive increase in the deficit.

Lawmakers also have criticized the Bush plan for failing to provide enough money for a new deposit insurance fund that the administration has suggested calling the Savings Association Insurance Fund, or SAIF. Treasury officials said their plan calls for SAIF to have $9 billion in funds by 1989. But the officials were unclear if the $157 billion included the SAIF funding.

Brady told the banking committee the administration wants to preserve an S&L industry that is separate and distinct from commerical banking as long as S&Ls are willing to strengthen their balance sheets.

Under the Bush plan, S&Ls would be regulated under less strict rules if they specialize in making home loans. The farther an S&L ventures from mortgage lending, the stricter the regulatory rules would become.

S&Ls also would have two years to boost their net worth to the level banks are required to maintain. Only half of the nation's 3,000 S&Ls meet that requirement, he said.

Many lawmakers and industry officials say the requirement is so steep that many S&Ls will not be able to meet it on time. One Treasury official who helped craft the Bush proposal said that in such cases the plan would give the institutions more time.

"No one wants to use the 'f' word," the official said, referring to the concept of forbearance, where regulators during the last six years have been permitted to give ailing S&Ls time to grow out of their problems.

Forbearance has been blamed by regulators, lawmakers and industry officials alike for allowing the S&L crisis to become, so costly.

Despite their criticism of the plan, lawmakers generally complimented Bush for having the courage to put a plan on the table.

S&L executives continued to lash out at the proposal, however, saying if implemented it would destroy the S&L industry by forcing it to pay too large a portion of the bailout cost.

TRIBUTE TO MARTIN HILLMAN AND BERTHA GILKEY

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct your attention to two New Jersey residents, Martin Hillman and Bertha Gilkey, whose actions have been both commendable and inspiring.

For years, the Miller Homes housing project in Trenton was considered unsafe and beyond redemption. Drug dealers flocked the hallways, and periodic gunfire was commonplace.

Under the combined effort of Mr. Hillman and Ms. Gilkey, however, this desperate situation has been rectified. Martin Hillman, executive director of the Trenton Housing Authority, hired Bertha Gilkey to succeed where years of Federal, State and local rehabilitation programs had failed. Under the shared premise that success depends upon changing the attitudes of the people living in the project rather than upon the buildings themselves, Ms. Gilkey and Mr. Hillman have transformed the Miller Homes into a place of pride and self dignity, a place suitable for raising a family.

In addition to expressing the praise these two individuals deserve, I would like to submit, in its entirety, this article from the New York Times of Sunday, December 25, 1988.

PRIDE RETURNS TO A HOUSING PROJECT, AND SHE LEADS THE WAY

(By Olga Wickerhauser)

TRENTON.—To everyone familiar with it, the Miller Home housing project used to be considered beyond redemption. Drug dealers operated in the doorways and halls, selling to addicts who sometimes lined up 100 deep. Despite the shortage of public housing, Miller Homes always had vacancies. Only the desperate would agree to move in.

The situation got so bad about a year ago that Mayor Arthur Holland suggested tearing down Miller Homes as the only way to clean it up.

But today, the drug dealers are gone. Teen-agers shoot baskets on a court in front of the buildings. Neat bunches of chrysanthemums, in season, border the tiny patches of lawn, and grandparents take their grandchildren for walks without fear of being cut down by gunfire. And tenants of other public housing projects want to move into what are becoming known as "Miller Homes condos" or "Miller Homes estates."

A miracle has happened to Miller Homes, in the opinion of many people, and everyone who has watched it agrees that it is because of one woman, Bertha Gilkey.

A child of the St. Louis slums whose life was once no better than that of the Miller Homes residents, Ms. Gilkey has spent the last 20 years rehabilitating the worst public housing projects in the country. She has managed to do what Federal, state and local governments, with the help of hundreds of millions of dollars, have failed to do—make public housing projects safe, clean, decent places for people to live, state official agree.

NO OTHER PLACE TO GO

Last summer the Trenton Housing Authority hired Ms. Gilkey, 40 years old, to save Miller Homes. Martin Hillman, executive director of the authority, said he knew the city could not afford to tear down the project because there was no other place to house the 256 families who live there.

So with a $2 million Federal grant to improve the buildings, and an $80,000 gift from the state to pay for 24-hour police protection, Mr. Hillman began a program to rehabilitate Miller Homes. This time, though, the rehabilitation would take a different approach.

"We had tried numerous times before and spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to turn this place around, for nothing," Mr. Hillman said. "As soon as a door or window was replaced, it was smashed again."

Mr. Hillman and other housing officials had come to realize, he said, that "you can make all the structural changes you want, you can spend all the money you want, but until you have an attitudinal change in the tenants, you're not going to make it work."

PEOPLE FIRST, THEN BUILDINGS

Bertha Gilkey had been teaching that for years. It is the principle behind her success, she said.

"The Government always fails because it works on the buildings, not on the people," she said. "First, you have to give people back their pride, their dignity, make them feel good about themselves. Once you do that, the whole environment changes. Then it's easy to fix the buildings."

Ms. Gilkey has been working with Miller Homes since June. For three consecutive days each month, she meets personally with tenants. The visits, which often last until midnight, are a combination of religious revival, civics class and condominium association meeting. Between reports of forthcoming holiday pageants and Boy Scout meetings, Ms. Gilkey squeezes in a lecture on illiteracy or how to run an effective corporation, occasionally stopping everything to ask everyone to stand, hold hands and sing.

At a meeting in November, about 50 tenants filled the dingy community room, sitting on metal folding chairs under stained and sagging ceiling tiles and broken lights. Except for an elderly man, the residents were all women and children.

When Ms. Gilkey arrived, she was immediately surrounded like a favorite relative at a family reunion. There were hugs and kisses, and people could hardly wait their turn to tell her about how well one of their children had done on a math test, or how another child loved to read.

After chatting one-on-one with the tenants, she asked them to form a circle and hold hands, and led them in a gospel song.

Ms. Gilkey, a passionate, inspiring speaker who can raise the emotions of her listeners to fever pitch, spoke that night about the dangers of illiteracy. "Don't let the school system make statistics out of our children," she said, urging residents to fight and keep "the scum," the drug pushers, the muggers, the rapists, from taking over the homes of the poor.

BILL IN CONGRESS EXPLAINED

In cooler language, she explained a bill pending before Congress that would affect the tenants' eligibility for benefits. Hardly anyone had heard of it. Ms. Gilkey told the tenants to come prepared the next night to write letters to their Representatives, urging them to oppose the bill.

Later Ms. Gilkey gave a mini-class on how boards and committees work and told the tenants she would test them the next night on what they learned. She was not kidding.

In earlier meetings, Ms. Gilkey explained how to read a lease by taking apart a document paragraph by paragraph. She also lectured on the history of public housing. Both times she gave a test the next day.

Throughout the meeting, each tenant who spoke, no matter how briefly or on how trivial a topic, got applause and praise from Ms. Gilkey. People who had come to the meeting weary and hopeless left beaming with pride.

Everyone—from the police to the tenants to city officials—agrees that Miller Homes is not the same place it was six months ago when Bertha Gilkey first arrived. After seeing what she has done in Miller Homes, officials of other cities, including Newark, have expressed interest in hiring her.

"My God, has it changed!" Alberta Williams, president of the tenants' association and a resident of Miller Homes for 10 years, said of the housing project. "Before, all the crack heads were out there. You couldn't come in here without the dealers stopping your car, hassling you. They came in here with their car radios blasting. The noise was so loud you couldn't sleep."

THOUSANDS OF COMPLAINTS

Sgt. Robert Orlowski of the Trenton Police Department said the police would get thousands of complaints a year about Miller Homes, but no more. "People would just come right off the street and go into the hallways and shoot up drugs or smoke crack," Sergeant Orlowski said. In one early morning raid, he said, police arrested 61 people who had waited in line in the hall to buy drugs.

Round-the-clock police protection has kept the drug dealers away. Ms. Gilkey's task is to teach the tenants how to make sure they do not come back after she and the police leave.

"You have two problems," Ms. Gilkey said. "You have got to deal with the bad ones already here, and stop more bad ones from moving in."

For the first problem, she has taught tenants to elect floor captains—one or two residents on each floor whose job it is to make sure that the walls are free of graffiti, that the garbage is taken out regularly, that children do not run around unattended in the halls late at night, that the elevators are not used as public toilets.

She is organizing programs to meet the needs of the tenants and to improve their lives. She has persuaded retired carpenters and masons to volunteer their time and teach valuable skills to young unemployed high school dropouts. Volunteer gardeners have shown tenants how to landscape the few patches of grass in the mostly concrete development.

Ms. Gilkey is also working to establish an on-site day care center that will be staffed by tenants so that mothers and grandmothers can get jobs.

She has organized a Cub Scout troop, an after-school tutoring program in reading and math, and a girls' drill team—the Miller Homes Rockers. Her goal, she said, is to keep youngsters on track by "involving them."

SCREENING COMMITTEE SET UP

For the second problem of keeping the "bad ones" from moving in Ms. Gilkey has organized a joint tenant-housing authority screening committee. "Most housing developments in this country are used as dumping grounds for the mentally ill, dope pushers, the have-nots and want-nots," Ms. Gilkey said. "Then you ask, Why is public housing so bad? It's because we have the worst people who are thrown in here among the good.

"So you have to screen," she said. "We're looking for people who are going to move into public housing and treat it like their home."

Prospective tenants will have to answer a detailed questionnaire. If they pass, they will undergo an orientation in a model apartment. They will be shown how to clean the windows and the shades, Ms. Gilkey said, what type of cleanser to use on the walls to protect the paint, how to wrap and dispose of trash, all basic skills that many public housing tenants have never learned.

Ms. Gilkey said her goal is to instill the poor with middle-class values and habits.

"The kind of standards of behavior that are tolerated among the poor would never be tolerated among the the middle class," she said. "You wouldn't have people smoking dope in the halls, urinating in the doorways, in a middle-class condo development. That is because the middle class is taught to have pride in their homes."

Ms. Gilkey teaches from personal experience, and tenants listen because they know she really does understand their lives. She insists on meeting with the tenants in the housing project, not in a neutral location. Wherever she goes in this country or abroad, she never stays in hotels. She stays with tenants, sleeping on a couch or on the floor, wherever they can accommodate her.

CITES HER OWN CHILDHOOD

Although she still cries when she talks about her loveless childhood, Ms. Gilkey keeps talking about it so that everyone will know how far she has come, against what odds, and that others can do it, too.

She was born in a St. Louis housing project, the third of 15 children of a mother who had her first child at the age of 11. As a young girl, she said, she was abused and beaten by a violent grandfather, raped by her mother's boyfriend and sent out to earn her own living when she was 14.

She has supported herself since then, while at the same time earning a college degree and raising two children who are both in college. The pride was apparent in her voice when she said: "I'm the first member of my family on my mother's and father's side to break the welfare shackles. I was supposed to end up pregnant, in jail, on welfare, another statistic. But I did something with my life."

For Miller Homes, the true test will come next summer, when Ms. Gilkey stops coming every month. Mr. Hillman says he is "conservatively optimistic."

"The ultimate goal is that after Bertha Gilkey leaves, the tenants can live as if Bertha Gilkey was still here," he said. "The ultimate goal is that the tenants will learn from her and pass it on to new incoming tenants, that mothers will pass it on to her children, and children will pass it on to their children's children."

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to show respect and honor for a nation that has never given up its struggle for freedom. We are commemorating the 71st Anniversary of Estonian Independence. This small but proud nation has experienced only 20 years of independence since the 13th century.

Estonia has had a long history of being conquered and ruled ruthlessly by either Russia or Germany. In 1918, while under German occupation, the people of Estonia declared independence. For the first time this proclamation of independence was recognized by France, Great Britain, and Italy. This recognition by other nations was limited but very significant for Estonia's international status. No other nation had ever before recognized her independence.

It took another year before Estonia would be able to live freely under her newly proclaimed independence. For the next 20 years Estonians prospered and lived as a free people. They achieved high standards in education and literature, agriculture, and industry produced at their highest levels and Estonian culture flourished. Estonians should be proud of the impressive accomplishments they achieved during their short-lived democracy.

The outbreak of World War II had devastating effects on this new independent nation. In 1940 the Soviet Union once again invaded Estonia and used brutal force to absorb Estonia into the Soviet Union. The reign of terror began again, stripping all Estonians of their freedom and national identity. Germany also invaded this strategically located country causing the Soviet Union to flee. However, the Nazi's ruled with complete injustice and forced all people to work for Hitler. The end of the war in 1941 brought the Soviet Union back into Estonia and the people found themselves being ruled once against under the iron hand of the Russians.

Post-WWII conditions proved to be even worse than living conditions under previous Russian rule. Estonians were deported and forced to leave their homes and cities in order to bring in new citizens from the Soviet Union. All private institutions became nationalized and farms were collectivized. Censorship was imposed on the press and personal mail. Travel inside the country was made very difficult. Soviet citizens today still continue to hold all top business and political positions, reducing Estonians to a second class minority in their own country.

Oppressive conditions still exist to this very day. The strong independent spirit the Estonians have as a nation has caused them to suffer greater hardships under Soviet domination. Their unwillingness to be absorbed into the Soviet culture has created a massive campaign by the Soviet Union to russify all Estonians. Soviet russification is eroding the very culture and life the Estonians have as a distinct people.

Estonians have fought for centuries for their freedom and are still struggling for basic human rights in 1989. This continual violation of human rights in our present day is an atrocity. The United States has never reconigzed the forced incorporation of Estonia into the Soviet Union and I am here today to reaffirm that position. I salute all those Estonians who have died in their fight for freedom and for those who still fight for that most cherished human right.

NATIONAL APPRENTICESHIP IMPROVEMENT ACT

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, since Medieval times, apprenticeships have been an invaluable means of teaching skills and trades. History abounds with tales of master craftsmen and tradesmen teaching their skills to eager learners. Christopher Columbus, Leonardo da Vinci, Galileo and even the fictional Ebeneezer Scrooge gained knowledge through apprenticeships.

In 1989, the need for quality training filled by apprenticeship programs remains very strong. Modern apprenticeship programs place qualified applicants in training programs for high demand occupations for the mutual benefit of employers and employees. Key challenges for the United States in the coming decade and into the 21st century will be to eliminate the twin weights of the Federal budget and trade deficits and to retain our status as a world leader in research and development and economic growth. We will not achieve those goals unless we place productive educational programs like apprenticeship training high on our list of priorities.

Recent studies indicate that the majority of jobs created in the 1980's have been low-paying, low-skilled positions. Some of these positions are probably necessary for the continued smooth conduct of commerce in the United States. However, we cannot sustain our economic position or build a kinder, gentler nation without encouraging growth of reasonable wage skilled jobs. The keys to rebuilding America's competitive edge and to ensuring a prosperous future for our Nation are strong, forward-looking skills education and development. No better skills training method can be found than that which employs the knowledge of the masters of the trade: apprenticeship.

The Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training [BAT], an agency of the Department of Labor, is charged with the regulation and development of apprenticeship programs. The BAT staff and other resources are simply inadequate to perform that mission. The Bureau has been decimated by budget cuts in recent years. Since 1981, BAT has suffered staff reductions of 43 percent. BAT offices in several major metropolitan areas have been closed and several important services have been discontinued. Simultaneously, the need for skilled workers and apprenticeship programs has grown to crisis proportions.

Today, it is more important than ever that Americans train for a competitive future. The bill I am introducing today will allow the BAT to improve its assistance to existing apprenticeship programs and, through outreach and information gathering, develop new apprenticeship training opportunities. The bill establishes the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training as an independent agency of the Department of Labor, and increases the number of full-time BAT employees to 377, the minimum number necessary to perform the essential functions of the Bureau. In addition, my bill reestablishes a national information collection system to evaluate the success of existing apprenticeship programs and to encourage development of programs in fields with current or projected opportunities.

President Bush wants to be the education President. He has also said our national will is strong but our wallet is thin. To enable our Nation to continue to compete successfully in an increasingly competitive world economy, Congress and the administration must support a strengthened and improved education and training system. As a member of the House Budget Committee, I am painfully aware of our thin wallet and the budget constraints we face. The National Apprenticeship Improvement Act addresses our training needs without emptying our wallet. The low-cost initiative would assist our Nation's businesses and their workers in their critical efforts to maintain and improve the quality of America's work force.

Apprenticeship training is conducted by private organizations and businesses, with no financial incentive from the Federal Government. A small Federal investment in the administrative, assistance, research, and outreach services provided by the staff of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training is likely to yield great returns in the number and effectiveness of apprenticeship programs in our Nation. The bill I have introduced today proposes a low-cost, high-yield investment in the lifeblood of our economy—a well trained work force. I strongly encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF BLACKS IN NEW MEXICO

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding contributions of 12 black Americans to the State of New Mexico. These men and women were honored this month, Black History Month, by the Albuquerque chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People for their service to their State and community.

New Mexico is recognized primarily for the Hispanic and Indian culture that has become woven into the fabric of America. But despite representing only 2 percent of our population, blacks for decades have played a telling role in the progress of New Mexico and its key institutions.

Those honored here today overcame prejudice and discrimination to record many firsts for their race. Further, they served as role models for the black community. But more significantly they improved the quality of life for all races by their perseverance, hard work and commitment to excellence in their respective professions or areas of voluntarism.

Those commended for their courage and sacrifices are: Dr. Charles Becknell, Juba Clayton, Tommy Jewell Jr., Albert Johnson, James A. Lewis, Lenton Malry, Abraham Lincoln Mitchell, Charlesetta Morrisey, Katherine and Pete Powdrell, Willie Walker Williams and Mamie Watson.

Dr. Becknell in 1970 founded the Afro-American Studies Department at the University of New Mexico and the New Mexico Black Leadership Conference. He also served as the State secretary for criminal justice from 1977–80.

Ms. Clayton became the first black to produce, direct, and act in local plays through her theater company, "Newchild Productions." She also directs the Afro-American Student Services at UNM.

Mr. Jewell became the first black judge in New Mexico. In January, he was rated the best judge by the State bar association.

Mr. Johnson, who passed away in 1984, was the first black mayor of Las Cruces in 1968. He also was the State environmental quality coordinator for the White Sands Missile Range.

Mr. Lewis, who passed away in 1947, was the second black doctor in Albuquerque. In 1920, he opened the People's Sanitorium for tuberculosis victims. He was also instrumental in desegregating New Mexico schools.

Mr. Malry was the first black principal in the Albuquerque public school system, the first black State representative and the first black county commissioner. He was also the school system's first black equal opportunity specialist.

Mr. Mitchell, who died in 1973, was recognized for his work in civil rights, Discrimination prevented him from being allowed to teach at the public schools in Albuquerque. He was instrumental in setting up New Mexico's first NAACP chapter in 1915. He was among the first black New Mexican recipients of the United Nations Award.

Ms. Morrisey is a volunteer member of many community-minded organizations in Albuquerque, including the National Council of Negro Women, Women in Community Service, Church Women United, and the NAACP.

Mr. and Mrs. Powdrell have served as role models for Albuquerque youths. Successful entrepreneurs for 20 years, they operate three restaurants and employ more than 100 people.

Mr. Williams was recognized for his work in uniting the black community in Albuquerque. For many years he was the pastor of a local church.

Ms. Watson was also honored for her community service activities. She is the supervisor of the Psychiatric Services Unity at the city-county jail. In that capacity, she has counseled women and minority prisoners.

It is with great pleasure that I recognize these individuals for their splendid efforts on behalf of their race and all New Mexicans.

NATIVE AMERICAN SKELETAL REMAINS

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the Smithsonian currently has the remains of almost 19,000 native Americans in its possession. Indian remains make up 42.5 percent of the Smithsonian's skeletal holdings; whites comprise 20 percent; Eskimos, Aleuts, and Koniags, 11.9 percent; blacks, 5.1 percent; and others, 20.6 percent.

Approximately 4,000 of the native American skeletal remains within the Smithsonian's possession were acquired from the Army Medical Museum. Of these, about 3,400 are prehistoric—before 1500 A.D.—and 600 are historic—after 1500 A.D. The 600 historic remains were assigned tribal identifications by the Army Medical Museum but the Smithsonian supports the documentation provided on only 270 of them.

While most of the prehistoric skeletons were obtained by archeological excavation of native American grave sites and burial grounds, many of the 600 historic remains were obtained from the Army which systematically collected Indian bodies prior to the turn of the century. In some cases remains were stolen from existing native American cemeteries chiefly by Army personnel, and later transferred to the Smithsonian from the Army Medical Museum.

The Smithsonian contends that these remains are of considerable scientific value. The fact remains that these native American skeletal remains are being denied proper burial. They've already had 100 years to study most of them. Enough is enough.

I am introducing legislation aimed at reinterring the historic skeletal remains of native Americans within the Smithsonian's possession. I propose that a 2-year period for identification of these remains be granted. After such time, these remains should be returned to those Indian tribes that request them.

While other legislation has been introduced to cover both prehistoric and historic remains, this legislation is specifically designed to address historic remains which are more readily identifiable than those that are prehistoric in nature.

This proposal represents a reasonable and workable solution to this matter. It is also a step toward assuring that native American remains are treated the same and accorded the same respect as those of other citizens. Finally, it protects the fundamental rights of tribal descendants to ensure proper burial of the remains of their dead ancestors.

CREDIT REFORM

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, over the past 10 years, considerable progress has been made in credit budgeting. Once virtually ignored in both the congressional and executive budget processes, Federal credit programs now receive significant and explicit consideration in the formulation of fiscal policy.

Today I am reintroducing the comprehensive credit reform legislation that I introduced near the close of the 100th Congress. This legislation would achieve the basic yet elusive goal of credit reform—to reflect the true costs of Federal credit programs in the budget.

This is easier said than done. In pursuing this goal, Congress, on a bipartisan basis, and both Republican and Democratic administrations, have recognized the importance of correcting the distortions of the budget accounting practices for credit programs. These practices overstate the costs of direct loans and understate the costs of loan guarantees. Credit programs also tend to escape the scrutiny commonly applied to noncredit programs. As a result, we not only have difficulty comparing credit to noncredit programs, but we also have distortions in resource allocation because our inappropriate accounting practices send false cost signals.

The underlying principle of credit reform is to create a level playing field, not only between credit programs—direct loans and loan guarantees—but also between credit and noncredit programs.

Over the years, the question of how to measure the costs, or subsidies, of credit programs has occupied considerable attention. So, too, has the question of how to incorporate theory into practice; that is, actually determining or estimating the subsidies of credit programs and recording them in the budget. While no complete consensus has emerged, a convergence of views has. This thinking was incorporated in earlier versions of the bill—H.R. 1745 and S. 745—that were introduced in the 100th Congress. The bill I am introducing today is identical, except for the year in the title, to H.R. 5568, which I introduced on October 21, 1988. This bill was a major initiative of the previous administration and was developed as a result of extensive cooperation and consultation between Hill and OMB professional staffs. President Bush has confirmed his support for credit reform—see, for example, page 20 of his budget document, "Building a Better America," February 9, 1989.

The principal change in this legislation compared to H.R. 1745 and S. 745 is the elimination of the requirement to sell loan assets in order to determine subsidies. Under the new proposal, these costs would be estimated.

Importantly, under credit reform Federal agencies would continue to administer credit programs. They would continue to originate direct loans and loan guarantees and to collect repayments, interest, and fees as they now do. Agency accounts would reflect the subsidy costs and these costs would be appropriated as are most noncredit spending programs. No congressional committee would be either advantaged or disadvantaged in terms of their budgetary resource allocations.

I am pleased that the following Members are joining me as original cosponsors: Representatives ARMEY, BEILENSON, BUECHNER, GREEN, HOUGHTON, NANCY JOHNSON, and REGULA.

FLORIO HONORS DR. HAROLD A. MILLER

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues an educator who, after 30 years of community service, retired as principal of the Cinnaminson Middle School on August 31, 1988. I am referring to my constituent, Dr. Harold A. Miller, of the First Congressional District in New Jersey.

Dr. Miller began his career in education in 1950 with the Camden Board of Education until joining the Cinnaminson school system in 1955. Proving himself as a motivated teacher and competent administrator, Dr. Miller became vice principal of junior-senior high school in 1964 and principal of the middle school in 1969. Throughout this time, he pursued his masters degree in education and administration and obtained a doctorate of eduation from Temple University in 1972. It is, therefore, evident that his commitment to the benefits of a full education were proven not only by his words, but by his deeds as well.

The attainment of the best education for the students was consistently an objective of Dr. Miller. Through his membership with the National, New Jersey, and Burlington County Education Associations, Dr. Miller constantly strived to discover the most improved curriculum and advanced educational techniques. It is by no accident that the superior education received by many of the students within the Cinnaminson District came about under the stewardship of Dr. Miller.

Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1989, Dr. Miller will be honored by the community he served so well for his many years of dedication and service. Please join me in saluting Dr. Miller and wishing him much success and happiness in the many years to come.

TRIBUTE TO REV. LEROY BOWMAN

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a very special member of my community and to express my appreciation for his work and commitment to the city of Annapolis. Rev. Leroy Bowman's endeavors include a range of community achievements from aiding in the desegregation of public housing to establishing day care centers in various communities for young mothers.

Following his retirement of 37 years as a civilian employee in the Office of the Treasury, Reverend Bowman was appointed as a commissioner for the Annapolis Housing Authority. Reverend Bowman's hard work and determination lead to his gradual advancement to acting director of the housing authority, where much of his efforts were focused on the needs of the elderly. Consequently, Reverend Bowman worked with the State Department on Aging to establish sheltered housing programs which prevented premature institutionalization of the elderly.

Reverend Bowman's efforts have also extended to the spiritual community. Despite his detailed involvement in the Housing Authority, Reverend Bowman has performed 46 years as pastor of the First Baptist Church in Annapolis, Maryland, where my friend has enhanced the lives of people of all ages: local youth; and midshipmen from the U.S. Naval Academy.

Reverend Bowman's time and effort have greatly contributed to the Annapolis community. It is with great admiration and pride that I thank Reverend Bowman after his recent retirement from the housing authority, for all his years of service to the Annapolis community.

THE CONGRESS BICENTENNIAL PROGRAM

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, during this Bicentennial Year of the Congress, the Library of Congress has planned a series of events to celebrate this important occasion. My colleagues have already seen the banner hanging from the James Madison Memorial Library Building announcing Congress' Bicentennial.

As chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, it is my pleasure to give you the calendar of events for the Library of Congress celebration.

I commend James H. Billington, the Librarian of Congress, and his staff for their vision in presenting such a program. I urge my colleagues to participate in these events whenever possible:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS—CALENDAR OF EVENTS

THE CONGRESS BICENTENNIAL PROGRAM

February 8: The Tides of Party Politics: Two Centuries of Congressional Elections, 1789–1989. A cartographic exhibition of the one hundred congressional elections from 1789–1989.

February 9–10: Understanding Congress: A Bicentennial Research Conference. A seminar sponsored by the Library's Congressional Research Service, with the U.S. House and Senate Commissions on the Congressional Bicentennial.

March 8–9: Knowledge, Power and the Congress. A Library of Congress Council of Scholars symposium.

March 22: Sixth Annual Forum on Federal Information Policies. A conference sponsored by the Federal Library Information Center Committee.

Summer: Educator's Institute. A two-week institute for teachers and librarians offering the opportunity to study Congress.

September 28: "To Make All Laws": The Congress of the United States, 1789–1989. A major exhibition depicting how Congress has grown and developed over the past 200 years, and how its labors have shaped our history and our lives.

The exhibit will be accompanied by a companion volume, written by Dr. James H. Hutson, Chief of the Library's Manuscript Division.

October 1989–December 1990: "To Make All Laws": The Congress of the United States, 1789–1989. A national circulating exhibition which will tour to 30 libraries around the country.

November 6: Public Property: Images of American Government. A small exhibit focusing on government as conveyed in American prints, drawings, and architecture.

Fall: The Congress Portfolio. An educator's resource packet and display for schools and libraries.

Fall: A Salute to the Congress. The American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers (ASCAP) joins the Library to host an evening of popular music.

Fall: Biotechnology and the Congress. A symposium jointly sponsored by the Library's Council of Scholars and the Library's Congressional Research Service.

Winter: My Dear Wife: Letters From Congressmen to Their Wives. An exhibition of letters from Congressmen to their wives.

January 1990: Senate Bicentennial Film Festival. A festival drawing on the Library's national collections of motion pictures and televised productions.

Year-long: Congress in the Year 2000. A special study and collection of commissioned papers, undertaken by the Library's Congressional Research Service.

TRIBUTE TO STATE SENATOR HENRY KIRKSEY

HON. MIKE ESPY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to turn our attention to a man who dedicated his life to improving the quality of life for all Mississippians—State Senator Henry Kirksey.

He is known as a virtual icon, a tireless warrior of unsurpassed integrity, courage, dedication, and intellect. He is the architect of political progress and empowerment in Mississippi.

Without a doubt, Senator Kirksey is responsible for my election in 1986 as the first black Congressman from Mississippi since Reconstruction. He, along with other Mississippians, fought for years for the lawsuit which resulted in a black-majority district.

Through his years of public service, he has waged a lonely campaign to expose the corruption and mismanagement which have helped to keep Mississippi on the Nation's economic floor.

Recently, Mississippi Gov. Ray Mabus was successful in pushing a local referendum for the country unit system. But, before the unit system became popular, Senator Kirksey issued the call for county government reform. Before passage of the State's education reform act, Senator Kirksey was a champion of education, fighting for constitutional changes to create a lay board of education, compulsory school attendance, statewide kindergartens, and consolidation of the State's 154 school districts. Since the 1960's, he has been an advocate for increasing teacher's salaries.

Mississippi has made significant progress since the 1965 Voting Rights Act, but change did not always come willingly. Electoral schemes were devised to dilute the effectiveness of blacks' vote. But, Senator Kirksey figured out the schemes, exposed them one by one, then defeated them in Federal court.

As a result, the State now boasts more black elected officials than any other State. Once all-white State, county, and municipal governments, including the State's capitol, Jackson, now include blacks, as does the State legislature.

Almost 2 years since retiring from the State senate, the historic progress forged by Senator Kirksey will be evident again this April when Mississippians go to the polls to elect county, chancery, and circuit court judges. Because of his successful 1986 lawsuit, Kirksey versus Allain, which virtually no one thought he could win, blacks will have the chance to elect several black attorneys to judgeships, finally gaining a substantial voice in the legal process.

Now, for the first time, blacks in Mississippi will be able to interpret the law and make crucial decision about its application. Kirksey versus Allain has impacted across America, for it represented the first time the Voting Rights Act has been applied to judicial elections.

Senator Kirksey has never been one to worry about whether or not his positions were popular, not the consequences for himself. More than once he has run for offices when the prevailing wisdom was there was no way he could win: Governor in 1975, U.S. Senate in 1978, mayor of Jackson in 1985, Lieutenant Governor in 1987.

But, for Senator Kirksey winning constitutes far more than just getting the most votes. In a State where for too long blacks did not run for office, Senator Henry Kirksey blazed a trail for others to follow.

A man of incredible humility and modest means, for years Senator Kirksey has neglected his own personal needs for the needs of his community. He still spends countless hours in his office, analyzing economic, educational, and political data, devising strategies, not to make money, but to make Mississippi and America what it ought to be. His work is his reward, the progress toward equality, his fulfillment.

Take the courage of John Brown, the intellect of Frederick Douglas, the resourcefulness of Harriet Tubman, the uncompromising passion of Malcolm X, combine them with a perserverance and modesty all his own and add an ardent love for genuine democracy, and you begin to understand Henry Kirksey. He is truly a great Mississippian, an even greater American. He epitomizes the very best of our history.

NATIONAL GRADUATE AND PROFESSIONAL STUDENT AWARENESS WEEKEND

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the valuable contributions, present and future, of today's graduate and professional students. Without a doubt, these are the future teachers and leaders of our great Nation. On March 2, 1989, the National Association of Graduate-Professional Students will hold its Third Annual National Conference at the University of Miami. To commemorate this meeting, I have introduced House Joint Resolution 77, declaring March 2 through March 5, "National Graduate and Professional Student Awareness Weekend."

As these hard working young men and women prepare for their annual conference, I think it is important to realize the value and impact of their training on the future of our Nation and our world. Many of our colleagues were once graduate or professional students while other former graduate and professional students are now the medical, legal, scientific and educational leaders in our Nation. Realizing their important role, the State of Florida has declared March 2 through March 5 as "Graduate Student Awareness Weekend." I am pleased that this fine group has been so duly recognized by my fellow Floridians, and I am happy to stand here today to honor them myself.

Many of these graduate and professional students barely make ends meet while they pursue their academic studies, and we need to recognize the sacrifices they are willing to make, for, if we cannot recognize their dedication and sacrifice today, we surely will not appreciate their accomplishments and achievements tomorrow. Mr. Speaker, as one who does appreciate these men and women, I wish to call our colleagues' attention the text of House Joint Resolution 77 as well as a list of our colleagues who have joined in sponsoring this resolution.

H.J. RES. 77

Whereas graduate and professional students serve vital roles in education;

Whereas graduate and professional students will be the researchers and educators of tomorrow;

Whereas graduate and professional students have organized themselves to present a unified voice as the National Association of Graduate-Professional Students; and

Whereas the National Association of Graduate-Professional Students represents graduate and professional students of all and diverse backgrounds from institutions throughout the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the weekend of March 2 through March 5, 1989, coinciding with the National Association of Graduate-Professional Students Annual National Conference, is designated as "National Graduate and Professional Student Awareness Weekend", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such weekend with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

LIST OF SPONSORS OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 77

Mr. Fascell, Mr. Lehman of Florida, Mr. Pepper, Mr. Smith of Florida, Mr. Dymally, Mr. Donald E. Lukens, Mr. Fauntroy, Mr. Levin of Michigan, Mr. Mavroules, Mr. Coleman of Missouri, Mr. Roe, Mr. Erdreich, Mr. Fuster.

Mr. Horton, Mr. Russo, Mr. Waxman, Mr. Owens of New York, Mr. Hughes, Mrs. Saiki, Mr. Evans, Mr. McDermott, Mr. de Lugo, Mr. Kolter, Mr. Fish, Mr. Bonior, Mr. Engel.

Mr. Fazio, Mr. Towns, Mr. Martinez, Mr. Lagomarsino, Mr. Lantos, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Bliley, Mr. Leach of Iowa, Mr. Flippo, Mr. Porter, Mr. Parker.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman GOODLING and I are introducing legislation reflecting the recommendations of the American Vocational Association for revision to the Carl D. Perkins Vocation Education Act.

The Perkins Act expires during this Congress and the Committee on Education and Labor will begin hearings on March 7 in order to prepare for reauthorization of that act. Having the views of the AVA in legislative form will be very helpful to the committee as we prepare our own bill to extend the act. The American Vocational Association is the foremost organization representing vocational educators throughout the country. The Congress has therefore long paid special attention to the recommendations of the AVA in that area.

The committee will soon be writing its own legislation to revise the Perkins Act. We hope that this bill will help to modernize vocational education so that it can help the United States become much more competitive in a world economy.

We are including in this part of the RECORD a summary of the AVA recommendations:

SUMMARY OF VOCATIONAL EDUCATION BILL

AUTHORIZATION AND FUNDING

The AVA bill would increase all funding levels to account for inflation and provide an "open-ended" authorization period similar to that of the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA). The bill would also remove a 2 percent set-aside of State basic grant funds for Title IV national programs and, instead, give each national program its own separate authorization.

FEDERAL GOVERNANCE/ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES

The AVA bill would provide that the Office of Vocational and Adult Education (OVAE) be authorized in Title I of the Perkins Act. It would spell-out essential functions necessary to run the Office and transfer those functions from the Secretary to the Assistant Secretary. The bill would require the President to nominate an Assistant Secretary with a vocational education background and require key staff to be experienced.

SOLE STATE AGENCY AND STATE GOVERNANCE

AVA's bill would retain the sole State agency provisions of current law and make certain modifications to increase State planning flexibility. The bill would also require that State directors of vocational education be qualified by experience.

SPECIAL POPULATIONS AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENT SET-ASIDES

AVA's bill would maintain the existing balance of Title II Basic State Grant funds at 57 percent for special populations (Part A) and 43 percent for program improvement (Part B). Existing set-aside for special populations within Part A would be maintained, but to promote State program consistency and allow for State-to-State variation, with the approval of the Assistant Secretary, States would be able to transfer up to 20 percent of any one special population category to another category.

SECONDARY AND POSTSECONDARY VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The AVA bill would provide that, of each State's basic grant allotment under Title II, at least 25 percent be available for secondary vocational education and at least 25 percent for postsecondary vocational education, including education for adults in out-of-school settings.

VOCATIONAL STUDENT ORGANIZATIONS

AVA's bill would emphasize the importance of vocational student organizations (VSOs) by requiring that Federal and State staff have an understanding of VSOs and by giving members of student organizations visibility on State and Federal advisory bodies.

TITLE III—SPECIAL PROGRAMS

AVA's bill would maintain each of the existing special programs provided by Title III including: assistance for community-based organizations serving disadvantaged youth; consumer and homemaking education; adult training, retraining, and employment development; comprehensive career guidance and counseling; and industry-education partnership for training in high-technology occupations. In addition, AVA's bill would integrate the Tech-Prep Education Act (H.R. 22) into the Perkins Act as a new Part F under Title III—Special Programs.

ACCOUNTABILITY AND THE NATIONAL VOCATIONAL EDUCATION DATA SYSTEM

AVA's bill would re-establish the National Vocational Education Data System with new requirements to provide for national program accountability, assure broad representation in its design and guarantee the relevance of data to State and local needs. It would also create up to ten leadership research institutes to improve teacher training and prepare the field to respond to the needs of the labor market and special populations.

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT

AVA's bill would create a new personnel development program in Title IV to provide opportunities: (1) for experienced vocational educators to spend time in advanced studies; (2) for vocational teachers to upgrade their skills; (3) for certified teachers trained in other fields and for persons in business and industry to become vocational educators; and (4) for gifted and talented vocational education students to be recognized.

MINORITY INSTRUCTOR RECRUITMENT

AVA's bill would place new emphasis on recruiting instructors from minority groups, as well as educators with experience teaching persons with limited English proficiency. The bill would further provide a new cooperative demonstration program aimed at attracting minorities to preparation for leadership within the field of vocational education.

LIMITED ENGLISH PROFICIENCY VOCATIONAL TRAINING

AVA's bill would authorize a new program of targeted assistance for the limited English proficient. The program would provide: (1) vocational education, training and worksite programs which integrate English language instruction into the curriculum; (2) vocational skill training for finding and keeping a job, designed specifically for persons with limited English proficiency; and, (3) special services which address the barriers imposed by cultural and language differences.

THE DORGAN/OAKAR TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS ON THE SOCIAL SECURITY RESERVE AND DEFICIT REDUCTION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, following are the recommendations of the Task Force on the Social Security Reserve and Deficit Reduction:

THE DORGAN/OAKAR TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS ON THE SOCIAL SECURITY RESERVE AND DEFICIT REDUCTION

CURRENT SCENARIO

Few things are more predictable than the retirement of the baby boom during the next century. In an effort to prepare to meet this challenge, the 1983 Amendments to the Social Security Act were designed to assure the long-term financial integrity of the Social Security system. Payroll taxes and benefit provisions were restructured to keep the system solvent as the baby boom reaches retirement age. The result of this was that large fund balances would be built up over the next four decades and then, thereafter, drawn down.

Although the 1983 Amendments took action to exclude the Social Security accounts from calculations of the federal budget, they are specifically included in measurements of the deficit until FY 1993 under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. After that time the Social Security accounts will be excluded from calculations of the federal deficit.

The annual "surplus" or reserves in the Social Security trust funds will be considerable. (In this report, the term "surplus" will be used to connote the annual excess of income of the trust funds over their outgo, even though this is not a proper usage of this term in accounting and actuarial terminology.) The trust fund surplus will represent 0.9 percent of the nation's Gross National Product (GNP) in 1989 and will increase to 1.5 percent by 1993 to $139 billion. During this same period the deficit in the operating budget is projected to reach $236 billion or almost 4 percent of GNP in 1993 if no further actions are taken to reduce it, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Factoring in Social Security reserves as offsets cuts the deficit nearly in half. The Social Security trust funds thus become a major factor in efforts to achieve the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction targets. (All figures quoted here for the long-range situation are from the intermediate-cost estimates of the 1988 Trustees Report.)

The Social Security trust fund surplus is projected to be $56 billion in FY 1989 and will grow to $97 billion in FY 1993. As shown below, these resources have become a major element in deficit reduction strategies:

Federal Deficit without Social Security Surplus	211	233
Social Security Surplus	56	103
Federal Deficit including Social Security Surplus	155	129

Source: Congressional Budget Office, current policy estimates (1/15/89).

By law, the Social Security Surplus is invested in securities guaranteed as to principal and interest by the federal government. These funds represent claims on future resources which under the present method of financing must be repaid to the Social Security System.

Concern had recently increased about the practice of including the Social Security trust funds in calculating the budget deficit because additions to these reserves ought not to be an excuse for large deficits in the rest of the budget. They should instead be used to increase the federal government's contribution to national savings, capital formation and future economic growth.

The reserves in the Social Security trust funds are intended to provide a cushion to fund future retirement needs of the baby boom generation. If the reserves are not saved, and the budget is not balanced without the trust-fund surplus, this nation won't really be accumulating additional resources to help meet future retirement claims.

TASK FORCE DEVELOPMENT

Under the direction of the Speaker of the House Jim Wright, Congressman Byron L. Dorgan and Congresswoman Mary Rose Oakar convened a panel of experts to look at the issues of the inclusion of the Social Security accounts in federal deficit calculations. Although the bipartisan group represented a wide variety of opinions and perspectives on deficit reduction as well as other economic issues, they agreed on the importance of assuring that the Social Security reserves are not misused and on the need to increased national savings, capital formation and future economic growth.

Following is a listing of the task force members:

Congressman Byron Dorgan and Congresswoman Mary Rose Oakar, Co-Chairpersons.

Henry J. Aaron, Brookings Institution.

Robert M. Ball, Independent Consultant.

Barry P. Bosworth, Brookings Institution.

Robert J. Myers, Independent Consultant.

John Palmer, The Urban Institute.

Charles L. Schultze, Brookings Institution.

Joanne R. Crosson, Douglas Norell, Andrew Kentz and Jeff Morelli (staff assistants).

TASK FORCE ISSUES

Although the group focused primarily on the issue of removing Social Security from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit calculations, a number of related questions and concerns were identified:

Will the presence of higher deficit targets propel Congress to quicker action on the deficit? Or, will large Social Security surpluses lull policy makers into doing less to balance the budget than they otherwise would?

It is the task force's belief that more realistic budgetary targets will elicit greater political effort and willingness on the part of the public to sacrifice more. Removal of the Social Security surpluses from deficit accounting will encourage lawmakers to act to reduce the deficit more quickly and encourage the government to save more.

Removal of the Social Security trust funds from calculations of the federal deficit may prompt a review of other trust funds as well. At issue is whether some of these trust funds should also be off-budget or whether it is more advantageous to have a more unified budget reflective of total government revenues and expenditures.

Strategies for removing the Social Security accounts from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit calculations should fit into a larger policy context that considers total investment, increased national savings, deficit reduction and capital investment.

TASK FORCE CONCLUSIONS

In light of the above considerations, the Dorgan/Oakar task force has concluded that the Social Security accounts should be removed from the federal deficit calculations. A summary of the reasons stated by the Task Force Members follows.

1. The current practice of using Social Security trust fund surpluses to offset current government expenses means that these surpluses are not adding to savings and investment that would reduce the burden to future workers of supporting the baby boomers during retirement. The trust funds should instead be used to increase national savings and enhance capital formation. The current generation should supply future generations with a larger capital stock, thereby reducing the burden of its own retirement benefits.

2. The future costs of providing for an aging population argue in favor of a greatly increased rate of national savings today. Instead, the current United States savings rate is barely one-third of its average from 1950 to 1980. Spending and savings patterns should be altered to generate surpluses at the federal level. Greater long-term growth will incease the ability of future generations to redeem the trust fund debt.

3. The practice of including Social Security receipts in order to reduce operating deficits amounts to using a system of regressive wage taxes to offset general fund outlays that were previously financed with more progressive personal and corporate income taxes.

4. Although the Social Security accounts are projected to run surpluses until around 2030, after that time, under present law government bonds must be redeemed to provide pensions to beneficiaries. The redemption of these bonds and transfer of these funds to the public will be a drain on resources.

On the other hand, if national saving is enhanced and productively invested between now and 2030, capital formation, future incomes and consumption will all rise. Such increases will ease the burden to future taxpayers of supporting baby boom beneficiaries.

The Social Security trust funds represent an opportunity for current workers to save for their retirement. If the reserves in the Social Security trust funds are to be of any real benefit in easing the financial burden of the baby boomer's retirement, efforts must focus on enhancing economic growth in the interim, so that the total economic pie that is available to be divided up among the retired and working population is larger than it otherwise would have been. This will be the case only if the Social Security surpluses, which are a form of public savings, result in higher savings and investment than would otherwise occur. But, they cannot have this effect if they are used simply to offset current deficits in other federal accounts.

5. The Social Security trust fund surplus should no longer be used to mask the budget deficit. Instead, the goal should be to bring the budget into balance exclusive of the Social Security accounts. Since Social Security is funded through dedicated payroll taxes, neither should benefits be reduced to offset deficits elsewhere in the budget.

6. Efforts should be made to learn from other nations which have had actual surpluses in their Social Security systems (Japan, Canada and Sweden), what mix of real investments—corporate and government securities, housing, and education—best serves the public and good while preserving funds for future retirees and increasing the stock of future assets.

POLICY OPTIONS

A number of strategies have been proposed for removing operations of the Social Security trust funds from the federal deficit calculations. Following is an overview of these options:

a. Remove the operations of Social Security from the deficit calculations now.

b. Begin now to reduce the amount of Social Security reserves that may be counted towards deficit reduction. Completely phase out the use of the reserves in deficit calculations by 1993.

c. Another strategy centers on waiting to fully determine the impact on other social programs before action. This recommendation includes waiting for the expiration of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law in 1993 and, the, extending it but gradually removing the annual Social Security surpluses from consideration in increments of $30-$35 billion.

An evaluation of the impacts of removing the Social Security accounts from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit calculations hinges on assumptions regarding spending levels for defense and nondefense appropriations. Consideration of tax policies, spending habits and savings patterns is also important.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, "In the longer run, the choice of a fiscal target turns on questions of national savings and investment, both domestic and foreign." The Dorgan/Oakar task force recommends that Congress select an option that fits into a larger deficit reduction plan which increases the likelihood of creating a larger capital stock and increased national savings to provide us with the means of paying future baby boomer retirement claims.

A TRIBUTE TO CHIEF VICTOR W. MENTINK

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Chief Victor W. Mentink on the occasion of his retirement from the city of Davis, California Police Department. On March 18, a retirement dinner will be held in Davis to honor Chief Mentink; I hope my colleagues will join me in honoring him here today.

Chief Mentink has served his country, community, and profession in an exemplary fashion. He served in the United States Army in Korea from 1953 through 1955 as an infantry operations intelligence specialist. In 1957, while studying criminal justice at California State University, Sacramento, he began his career as a police officer for the city of Davis. This marked the start of a distinguished 32-year career in law enforcement. He has served as chief of the Davis Police Department for the last 9 years. The high degree of loyalty, dedication, and professionalism Chief Mentink has shown throughout his career will be missed by all who have had the opportunity to work with him.

As he begins this new chapter in his life, it is only appropriate that we remember his accomplishments. He was cofounder of the city of Davis arson and bomb investigators' team, which later became the Yolo County arson and bomb unit. He also founded and directed the Davis police reserve program. Chief Mentink serves as a member of the California Peace Officers Association, Davis City Employees Association, the California Police Chiefs Association, and the International Association of Police Chiefs. In addition to his outstanding service with the police department, he has also taught in the criminal justice department at California State University, Sacramento.

Chief Mentink has shown a deep commitment to the community of Davis. He belongs to the Rotary Club, the Lions Club, the Optimist Club, the Davis High School Boosters Club, and serves on the board of directors for the Davis Little League and Cub Scout Pack 472. After his retirement, Chief Mentink plans to stay active in the Davis community

I would like to take this opportunity to thank Chief Mentink for his many years of dedication to the Davis Police Department and the entire Davis community. I know my colleagues will join me in congratulating Chief Mentink on his retirement and in wishing him the best of luck in all his future endeavors.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, Chairman AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS and I are introducing a bill which reflects the changes sought by the American Vocational Association to the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act. This program will expire on September 30 of this year.

We are pleased to introduce this bill on behalf of the AVA and hope it will enhance the discussions regarding the reauthorization of the act. The subcommittee will begin hearings in March to learn about the changes needed to the program. We hope to find ways to strengthen and coordinate the Federal effort. As the American Vocational Association has been the premier advocate of vocational education, we appreciate the advice given to Congress by the AVA. We introduce their bill to shed light on issues considered in the reauthorization.

Given the competition of our global economy, the changes in our technical industries, and the need for a literate, well educated workforce, we must find ways to strengthen our Federal effort in vocational education. I look forward to working with Chairman HAWKINS on the reauthorization of this important Federal program and am pleased to introduce the AVA bill with him.

SSI REFORM PACKAGE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, on February 6, 1989, Congressman DOWNEY, Congressman MILLER, and Congressman ROYBAL joined with me to introduce three bills, which, taken together, would make the Supplemental Security Income [SSI] Program fairer and more responsive to the truly needy it is intended to serve. The following is a section-by-section summary of the provisions of the third bill in this SSI reform package, H.R. 868:

SUMMARY OF SSI DISABLED AND BLIND CHILDREN ACT OF 1989, H.R. 868

Section 1. Short title: "SSI Disabled and Blind Children Act of 1989."

Section 2. Definition of disabled children.

(a) Requirement for individualized assessments.

This provision assures that, in determining whether a child is eligible for SSI disabled or blind child's benefits, the Secretary will look at each child individually and consider all of the child's functional limitations.

(b) Presumptive disability for certain genetic or congenital impairments for children age 3 and younger.

In order to avoid the problems currently created when the Secretary denies benefits to a very young child with disabilities because the child can not be properly tested until he or she is older, the Secretary will be required to presume that a child who is born with genetic or congenital impairments is disabled if it is probable that, when tests become more sophisticated, the tests would show that the child is disabled. This rule will apply to children age 3 and younger.

(c) Immediate publication of childhood mental impairment listings.

The Secretary will be required to publish a notice of proposed rulemaking [NPRM] on the "Revised Childhood Listings of Mental Impairments." The notice must be published within 30 days after enactment. The contents of the listings should be those submitted by the Mental Impairments Listing Workgroup to the Associate Commissioner for Disability on April 1, 1986. If the contents are different, the Secretary is required to explain in the NPRM what the differences are and why they exist.

(d) Review of all childhood listings

The Secretary will be required to solicit the advice of experts in childhood disability on changes which should be made to the children's "Listing of Impairments" so that they will take into account medical and functional rules which are appropriate to the age of the child. The Secretary is then required to publish the proposed revisions for comment within 18 months of enactment.

Section 3. Amendments related to resources

(a) Determination of family resources counted as available to a disabled or blind child

This provision changes the current rule for counting a family's resources so that it will more fairly take into account that other members of the disabled or blind child's family, particularly other children who are not disabled or blind, have needs which the family must also meet.

Under the new rule, the Secretary would apply the same resource exclusions which exist for individuals, with one exception. In calculating the amount of countable resources which will not be considered to be available to the disabled or blind child, the Secretary will not count an amount equal to the SSI individual's countable resource limit (this year, $2000) multiplied by the number of parents and siblings (other than the disabled or blind child) in the family.

(b) Treatment of income-producing property

In cases where a parent or spouse of a disabled or blind person has income-producing property, the Secretary will be required to exclude the value of the resource but to count the value of the income which is generated by the property.

The effect of this change will be to eliminate the Secretary's current rule, known as the "$6,000/6% rule." The person (or his child or spouse) is not eligible for SSI if the value of the property is more than $6,000 or it does not provide a return of at least 6% annually. This rule has been applied to the detriment of poor rural families to exclude their disabled children from the SSI program simply because the farm parent has more than $6,000 in equity in his farm equipment or has not been able to earn a 6% return on the property. Under the proposed language, the income generated by the property will simply be counted in deciding whether the child is eligible for SSI benefits.

Section 4. SSI disabled and blind children eligible for Medicaid in all states

Disabled and blind children whom the Secretary determines are eligible for SSI benefits will be eligible for Medicaid benefits in all states, including in "section 209(b)" Medicaid states.

Section 5. Effective date

Unless otherwise provided in the Act, the provisions of the Act will take effect on January 1, 1990.

IN MEMORY OF CHARLIE FEELEY

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 20, the residents of Newton, MA, suffered a very sad loss. With the death of Charlie Feeley, we lost someone who was, for a whole city, a good person, a good cop, and a good friend.

Charlie Feeley spent a long career on the Newton Police Department where he showed a degree of commitment to the welfare of other people that distinguishes police service at its best. While serving on the police force, Charlie Feeley became a certified safety officer back before most people had ever heard of this specialty, and he put his knowledge to excellent use by teaching thousands of Newton young people how to negotiate safely in urban traffic. He went on to found the Community Relations Program in the city, and before retiring as a lieutenant in 1984, after 42 years as a proud wearer of the city's police uniform, Charlie Feeley served the citizens of our city in a wide variety of ways.

Not surprisingly, for Charlie retirement was simply a chance to move full time into a kind of work he had done part of the time. He became very active on behalf of older people, serving as a radio talk show host on WNTN, and chairing the Newton Council on Aging. In all of these positions Charlie performed with a degree of dedication, expertise, and friendliness that always made him a pleasure to be around.

And it is that characteristic of friendliness that many of us will long think about when we think fondly of Charlie. He was above all a friend: To the children whom he taught about safety; to worried and frightened people who turned to the Newton Police Department for help or protection; to older people on whose behalf he was a vigorous and thoughtful champion; to myself and dozens of other elected officials who relied on him as a source of advice and counsel; and to, it seemed almost everybody in Newton who knew Charlie, loved him, and drew strength from his friendship.

Mr. Speaker, Charlie Feeley was an extraordinary human being and at least on this one occasion I know I speak for virtually everyone in my home city of Newton when I express our sadness at his death, and our gratitude that we had the chance to know and live with him for so long.

RESTORE UNFPA FUNDING

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, Congress will soon be debating the matter of U.S. Government support for the U.N. Population Fund, the largest multilateral organization providing family planning assistance for countries of the developing world.

Since 1986 the United States, for years the largest contributor to UNFPA, has contributed nothing at all to the Fund. But global population stabilization is a major issue in a world where 90 countries may double their current populations within only 30 years. And it is an issue that can be solved without an outrageous expenditure of money, but with common sense and coordination.

I am submitting for the RECORD an article from the Christian Science Monitor by Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute, which provides background on this vital issue that enormously effects the world's environment, employment and food supply:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 27, 1989]

STERILE POLICY

(By Werner Fornos)

The Chinese term hau pengyu means "old friend," but it goes well beyond a reference to acquaintanceship and connotes a special, lasting bond. It is brought to mind by President Bush's meeting in Beijing with the leadership of the People's Republic of China. The President renewed old friendships, but there is one issue that has strained the relationship lately.

During the last four years of the Reagan administration, the United States government has repeatedly accused the Chinese government of using coerced abortion and involuntary sterilizations in its national family planning program.

The charges led directly to the Reagan administration's declaring the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) ineligible for US funding because it contributes $10 million annually to China's $1 billion family planning program (which the administration somehow construed as sufficient evidence that the UN agency "participates in the management" of the Chinese program).

By using the charges against China to cut off funds to the largest and most effective multilateral organization providing family planning services to developing countries, the US government did a great disservice to countries whose demand for population assistance exceeds the aid currently available for this purpose.

President Bush can bring this fiasco, in which the US has turned its back on a UN agency it was instrumental in establishing, to an abrupt and overdue conclusion by accepting China's repeated assurances that it alone manages its programs.

Failure to address the problem now will, in all likelihood, ensure a diplomatic confrontation when the 48-nation UN Population Fund governing council meets in June. At that meeting a $57 million contraceptive technology assistance program for China will be proposed and debated.

The US is one of the 48 nations represented on the council, which is the proper forum for criticizing a UN agency's actions and raising questions of human rights violations in programs the UN funds. Interestingly enough, the US delegate to the council voted for the family planning grant to China from which the US has withdrawn its assistance.

The Bush administration should resume contributions to UNFPA with the stipulation that American dollars won't be spent in any family planning program that includes coercion or other violations of human rights.

Furthermore, the President, who has the responsibility for making this determination, can declare that a 1 percent contribution to a program does not constitute participation in its management. Then the US will be able to resume its longstanding partnership with industrialized nations that are coming to grips with the challenge of rapid global population growth through international channels.

In that way, family planning demands from more than 120 developing countries can be more adequately met and the UNFPA, with US assistance, can intensify efforts to stabilize world population.

ADOLESCENT FAMILY LIFE PROGRAM

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce legislation to revise and extend title XX of the Public Health Service Act, the adolescent family life demonstration project. The time has long passed for us to expand the current demonstration project into a full service program to meet the pressing needs of children who bear children.

The United States is in desperate need of such a program. One in ten young women between the ages of 15 and 19 will become pregnant in 1989. Our Nation leads nearly all other developed nations in rates of teenage pregnancy and childbearing; almost twice the rate of Britain, the next highest country.

The numerous problems incurred through early childbearing have resulted in an appalling rate of infant mortality. Teen mothers are less likely to receive early prenatal care, all too often resulting in the death of their children. It is my hope that providing services to low-income teen mothers can assist in the halt of this national tragedy.

The adolescent family life demonstration projects were established nearly a decade ago. We have studied the benefits of different approaches to service delivery. We have learned much through this program, and we have used that information to develop a full service program that targets those individuals who most desperately need our assistance.

The new program would authorize the Secretary of Health and Human Services to make grants and enter into contracts with public and nonprofit private entities. These organizations would provide services to pregnant adolescents choosing to carry their pregnancies to term. Such services would include comprehensive prenatal and postpartum care, well-child care, family planning services and a variety of other counseling services.

The legislation I offer today was crafted in conjunction with a coalition of organizations experienced in providing services to pregnant adolescents. We have demonstrated a need for this program. Each year 178,000 teenage girls under the age of 18 give birth. Under the current demonstration projects, only 9,000 of them are served. The time has come for us to authorize a full service program in an effort to help as many of these teens as we possibly can.

SALUTE TO THE SOUTH CHRISTIAN SAILORS 1988 MICHIGAN CLASS B GIRLS BASKETBALL CHAMPIONS

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, history books trace the origin of the game of basketball to a gymnasium in Springfield, MA. A physical education instructor, by the name of Dr. James Naismith, was looking for a game that his students could play indoors in the cold winter months. He fastened two peach baskets to the gymnasium balcony and told his students to try throwing a soccer ball into the baskets.

A century later, Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, December 10, 1988, the South Christian High School girl's basketball team of Grand Rapids, MI, hit the court and made its own mark in the history books. The South Christian Sailors captured the Michigan class B crown on that date by polishing off Flint Beecher by a final score of 53 to 49, and at the same time, became the first school in the Grand Rapids area ever to win both the boys and girls basketball title in the same calendar year.

A champion, Mr. Speaker, is one who exhibits uncommon superiority. The South Christian Sailors were not only superior during their tournament play but throughout the entire season as well—finishing the year with a perfect 28–0 record. In fact, out of more than 700 girls basketball teams across the State of Michigan, the Sailors were the only team to remain undefeated in 1988.

Mr. Sid Smit, who led the Sailors, said that one of the key ingredients to the successful season was that this was a great defensive team. He said, "If you work at it, defense will never take a night off". Sid Smit is right, Mr. Speaker, the Sailors worked long and hard at their defensive effort and it never took a night off.

It gives me pleasure to honor each of the following players, fine coaching staff and team managers. The players: Diane VanderKam, Donna VanderKam, Carla Sterk, Diann Lindhout, Pam Fryling, Marcy Bouma, Shannon Harris, Heidi Schrotenboer, Barb Sysma, Kris Schrotenboer, Tami Oosterhouse, Sheri Corwin, Nikki Mannes, Tami Hollemans. The managers: Missy Grevenstuck, Colleen Seabert. The coaches: Sid Smit, head coach; Pat Burgess, assistant coach.

Each individual ballplayer was vital to the overall success of the Sailors. But basketball is the ultimate team game, Mr. Speaker. One of the greatest things about the game is that the team with the best players will not always win—but the players who mold their talents into the best team, as the Sailors did, will win.

Mr. Speaker, please join with me in expressing heartiest congratulations to Michigan's 1988 class B high school girl's basketball champions—the Sailors of South Christian High School.

PAY RAISE REFORM

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, the questions surrounding how Members of Congress salaries are determined have plagued this House from its beginning. In 1789, there was great debate as to whether $6 per diem was too much to pay Members of Congress. In 1989 public outrage recently was focused on a proposal to provide Members a 51 percent salary increase.

While the recent vote which defeated the pay increase was a step in the right direction, it was only a single step down the long road of reform. Today, by using the ideas of one of our Founding Fathers we have the opportunity to move another step forward.

Nearly 200 years ago on September 25, 1789, Congress sent to the States for ratification a proposed constitutional amendment drafted by James Madison designed to limit the power of Congress to raise the salaries of its Members.

James Madison said of his amendment:

> There is a seeming impropriety in leaving any set of men without control to put their hand into the public coffers, to take out money to put in their pockets; there is a seeming undecorum in such power.

Though spoken 200 years ago, the timeless truth of these words is evident. This amendment, which prevents congressional pay raises from taking effect until after an election of Representatives has intervened, has been ratified by 26 States. Only 12 more are needed in order for this amendment to become law.

That is why today I am introducing a concurrent resolution which urges those States which have not put this measure before their respective legislatures for ratification to do so.

Having been a long-time advocate for reforming the manner in which Members' raises are handled, I believe that ratification of this amendment is long overdue, and will go a long way toward correcting the current system that so often offends the American people.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this measure which would show our support for reforming the pay raise process and eliminating much of the impropriety which exists in the current method of awarding Members salary increases.

ESTONIAN'S FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the struggle of a nation for freedom. Estonia, once a proud and sovereign nation, today finds itself as an occupied territory of the Soviet Union. The United States has never recognized Soviet sovereignty in this region. Just over 71 years ago, on February 24, 1918, the people of Estonia declared themselves to be a free people.

I am sad to report that the struggle for basic independence in Estonia has a long way to go before it reaches its goals. Although the Soviet Union signed the Treaty of Tartu in 1920, recognizing Estonian sovereignty in perpetuity, they have failed to live up to that agreement. Some estimates indicate that there are 150,000 Soviet troops in Estonia, trying to contain the spirit of 1 million residents.

Recent reforms in the Soviet Union have not quelled Estonia's desire for autonomy. Instead, the will for freedom has grown, as another generation of Estonians has gotten a small taste of nationalism. I encourage the President to continue the dialog with the Soviet Union started by President Reagan, and independence for the Baltic States must remain an item of the highest priority. Reforms in the name of freedom that do not bring about substantive and positive change in Estonia do not serve the interests of those who long for self-determination.

Mr. Speaker. I hope that all of my colleagues will take a moment to reflect on the importance of the Estonian's fight for freedom. Let us endeavor in our dealings with the Soviets to encourage changes that benefit all those who speak out for human rights.

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES DeLEO

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to honor Charles DeLeo on the occasion of the New York Blood Center's 25th anniversary.

Charles DeLeo may be one of the most dedicated blood donors of our time. He has donated 108 pints of blood, and has a standing appointment with the New York Blood Center to give "the gift of life" every 8 weeks. With only 4 percent of the Nation's population actually donating blood, Mr. DeLeo has greatly contributed to our city's safe blood supply.

The New York Blood Center, which celebrates its 25th anniversary on March 4, is grateful for such contributors as Charles DeLeo. It is Charles DeLeo, and other generous individuals, who help the blood center meet the blood transfusion needs of the 250 hospitals it serves in the metropolitan New York area.

Charles DeLeo works at the Statue of Liberty, where he is known as the "keeper of the flame." He is responsible for maintaining the light that is an international symbol of democracy and freedom. A decorated U.S. Marine of the Vietnam conflict, Mr. DeLeo draws his inspiration from Mother Theresa, and in fact the breadth of his unselfish nature is extensive. He has contributed up to 20 percent of his salary over the years to charitable causes, including the sponsorship of seven orphans and two widows in developing nations, and he has performed impromptu acts of kindness such as playing Santa Claus for children in need on Manhattan's Lower East Side.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that there are no bounds to the generosity of this individual. I am proud to honor Charles DeLeo for his capacity to give of himself, and, on the 25th anniversary of the New York Blood Center, for his lifesaving commitment to the donation of blood.

A TRIBUTE TO ALVIN L. GRAEBNER ON HIS 80TH BIRTHDAY

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Graebner was born on Summerson's Mountain, PA, on March 6, 1909. He was the youngest child of seven children. He lost his beloved mother, Mary, when he was 9 years old.

He helped his father, John, maintain the family farm. He married his lovely wife, June, in 1941. They have three daughters, eight grandchildren, and one great granddaughter.

Mr. Graebner's goal in life was to give his young family a better quality of life. The local PRR shops laid off their workers. Many of the people resorted to welfare or relief. Not Mr. Graebner, he went great distances in trying to find a good job. He was able to find employment with a railgrinding company by the name of Speno Railgrinding Co. Working for Speno was the break he was always looking for. The job enabled him to offer his family a comfortable standard of living. The job, however, was not without consequences. Mr. Graebner traveled with Speno taking him far north to Nova Scotia, to the far south to Florida, and the far west to California and Washington.

In order to give his family the part of the American dream, Mr. Graebner had to sacrifice the most important thing—he was not able to be with his family. The job made it necessary to be away from home for 8 to 10 weeks and home for about 2. He stayed with Speno for 12 years.

Finally, as the economy was improving Mr. Graebner was able to get a job with Penn DOT in Lock Haven, PA. After all the many years of being away, he was able to sleep and eat at his home and still earn a decent wage. Mr. Graebner retired in 1977 from Penn DOT.

Mr. Graebner's philosophy is you never give up. Life's obstacles make life more challenging and interesting. Anything worthwhile is worth a good fight.

Whatever perils he had to face, he faced them with a strong faith in God and his love and devotion to his family.

If the challenges are still there, Mr. Graebner possesses the same weapons: faith, love, and determination to win.

Mr. and Mrs. Graebner reside in Mill Hall, PA.

COPYRIGHT REMEDY CLARIFICATION ACT

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, February 27, 1989

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act at the request of the Copyright Office, and to be joined in this effort by my colleague, CARLOS MOORHEAD, the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property and the Administration of Justice, which I chair. This bill implements the recommendations of a study issued by the Register of Copyrights late last year.

BACKGROUND

The U.S. copyright law grants creators exclusive rights in their works. The law gives Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction to decide copyright cases. However, the 11th amendment to the Constitution generally prohibits Federal courts from hearing damage suits brought against a State by citizens of another State or country, and the Supreme Court has extended the principle of States' sovereign immunity to prohibit suits brought against a State by its own citizens.

In recent years a number of Federal courts have applied the Supreme Court's interpretation of the 11th amendment in copyright infringement suits brought against States, and have found that the States are immune from damage suits.[1] The legal issue presented in these cases was whether Congress, in enacting the Copyright Act of 1976 pursuant to its constitutional power to enact copyright legislation, subjected the States to copyright liability in Federal courts, notwithstanding the 11th amendment.

It is well established that Congress has the power to abrogate the States' 11th amendment immunity in statutes enacted pursuant to its plenary powers. However, in 1985 the Supreme Court announced a stringent test for determining whether Congress intended in a particular statute to create a cause of action against the States: "Congress may abrogate the State's constitutionally secured immunity from suit in Federal court only by making its intention unmistakably clear in the language of the statute." [2] Applying this test to the Copyright Act of 1976, five U.S. district courts and three U.S. circuit courts of appeals have held that the language of the Federal copyright statute is not sufficiently clear to demonstrate Congress' intent to abrogate States' 11th amendment immunity from suit in Federal courts in copyright infringement cases.[3] [3] Register of Copyrights, Copyright Liability of States and the Eleventh Amendment (1988).

When this clash between the Copyright Act and the 11th amendment first became apparent, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property and the Administration of Justice, Mr. MOORHEAD, and I asked Ralph Oman, the Registrar of Copyrights, to study the practical problems concerning the enforcement of copyrights against State governments, and to prepare a report on the current state of law in the area. The Copyright Office received public comments to assist in writing the report. A few States submitted copies of briefs they had filed in defending copyright infringement actions, but no State official asserted that the States could not do State business without immunity from copyright violations. The Copyright Office report concluded that if States are not held responsible under the Federal copyright statute (as all other users of copyrighted works are) the potential exists for immediate harm to copyright proprietors and authors in the form of widespread copying, especially in the area of State educational publishing, resulting increased prices of the infringed works and diminished creativity on the part of authors.[4]

As chairman of the subcommittee and responsible for the copyright law revision effort which culminated in the present law, I cannot help but recall that enacting the 1976 Copyright Act, Congress specifically focused debate on the extent to which States and their agencies utilized copyrighted works and should be either liable for or exempt from infringement. The Copyright Act contains several exemptions from liability in the case of activities of a "governmental body," which Congress thought encompassed not only the Federal Government but also State and local government. Until the recent application of the Supreme Court's strict test of 11th amendment abrogation, it seemed clear that the language and history of the 1976 statute reflected Congress' intent to hold States responsible under the Federal copyright law.

This bill, which is being introduced at the request of the Register of Copyrights, would amend the Copyright Act in order to clarify Congress' intent that States be subject to damage suits in Federal court for their violations of the Copyright Act. Eleventh amendment jurisprudence dictates that in order to carry out the original intent of the Congress, we must now amend the Copyright Act to make unmistakably clear in the language of the copyright statute that the States are subject to copyright liability. This amendment does not in any way change the substantive rights of copyright owners.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Copyright Remedy Clarification Act".

SEC. 2. LIABILITY OF STATES AND INSTRUMENTALITIES OF STATES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT AND EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS IN MASK WORKS.

(a) COPYRIGHT INFRINGEMENT.—Section 501(a) of title 17, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "As used in this subsection, the term 'anyone' includes any State and any instrumentality of a State, both of which shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.".

(b) INFRINGEMENT OF EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS IN MASK WORKS.—Section 910(a) of title 17, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "As used in this subsection, the term 'any person' includes any State and any instrumentality of a State, both of which shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act but shall not apply to any case filed before such date.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, February 28, 1989, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, February 28, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Reverend James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us in all things, O God, to understand the meaning of praise and thanksgiving not only as something expressed in word and song, but also as an attitude of mind and spirit. Conscious of our dependence on You for our very lives and aware of Your redemptive gifts to us, may we learn to respond with words of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving to Your mighty deeds, and may we also see in our relationships the opportunities to express that same sense of joy and appreciation that comes when we truly acknowledge the rich blessing we have received. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAXON, kindly lead our colleagues in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. PAXON led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

CHINA MUST CLEAN UP ITS HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, China is a great and powerful nation whose ancient culture and civilization are indeed impressive. American-Chinese relations are important—and hopefully will broaden and improve in the future—but not at the expense of sweeping under the rug Chinese human rights violations. The sooner Beijing understands that the commitment of the American people and the American Congress to human rights is nonnegotiable, the better it is for both of us.

The crude and uncivilized actions of over 100 Chinese policemen in physically preventing one of our President's invited guests from attending his farewell banquet is an outrage. The continued persecution of peaceful Tibetans for attempting to exercise their religious rights and to preserve their cultural identity is totally unacceptable.

Chinese authorities must understand that better relations with the United States lie ahead only if they clean up their human rights act.

IN SUPPORT OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 84, ESTABLISHING THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND FAMILIES

(Mr. SMITH of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of House Resolution 84, which will establish the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.

Since its inception in 1983, this select committee has worked diligently to assess the conditions in which American children and their families live. I commend the membership of the committee for their efforts to help us better understand the profound social, demographic, and economic changes that have transformed America's families.

Special difficulties are faced by our citizens of Hispanic origin. Hispanics are the youngest ethnic group. In 1985, 40 percent of all Hispanic children were living below the poverty line. We must not let these young people remain on the sidelines of life. We must ensure that they grow up healthy, well educated, and with the opportunity to participate fully in the economic and social life of our country.

I know that the well-being of our Nation's children and families is important to Members on both sides of the aisle.

I urge all of my colleagues to support this important legislation.

GEORGE BUSH IS ALL RIGHT

(Mr. ACKERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, this fellow, George Bush, is all right. At first I wrote off a guy who heard little voices that no one else heard, who saw a thousand points of light, and who wanted people to read his lips. But I was wrong.

One by one he is going to reform America.

In an attempt to find out why my initial call was wrong, I went to the video tape, turned down the volume and I read his lips. He did not say "one thousand points of light," he said "one thousand appointments, all light."

Now it is beginning to make sense. George Bush took C. Boyden Grey, made him give up his conflicts of interest in exchange for a White House position as watchdog of our ethics.

He convinced William Bennett to give up a chemical dependency on nicotine by putting him in charge of everyone else on drugs.

And now because of George Bush's leadership, John Tower is willing to take the pledge and give up the demon rum in exchange for going into a 4-year program as Secretary of Defense.

What a guy.

Mr. Speaker, as I watch the thousand appointments all light, and the unfolding American reformation, I am sure of four things.

First, that if Willie Horton plays his cards right, he will be chairman of the Federal Parole Board.

Second, that if the Ayatollah becomes even more moderate, he will head up the Library of Congress.

Third, that if Jesse James were alive today, he would be selected as Director of the Mint.

Fourth, that the selection of DAN QUAYLE was no fluke.

ELIMINATING CONTINUING RESOLUTIONS

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill which will go a long way toward eliminating the fiscal fiasco that we engage in every year known as the continuing resolution. Everybody in the country knows that the Congress has failed year after year to meet its constitutional and own set statutory deadline of September 30 for enacting a budget, and then the Congress falls back into that devil of a continuing resolution which continues the process, allowing private bills, to be introduced, special interests and chaos to enter into our budget process.

This bill would create a situation whereby if by September 30 the Congress has failed under its own law to enact a budget that automatically at midnight of that day the previous year's budget would automatically be enacted, and thus we would have a budget in place. The Congress could still work its will as to any new budget it wanted to do without all of the game playing that is now part of the budget making process in the continuing resolution.

I invite the cosponsorship of Members.

BILL TO RESTORE TAX EXEMPTIONS FOR EMPLOYER-PROVIDED EDUCATION BENEFITS

(Mr. PICKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to restore the tax exemptions for employer-provided education assistance that expired at the end of 1988.

Under this legislation, the first $5,250 in education benefits that an employee receives for undergraduate study would be exempt from Federal taxation. For graduate students, the exemption would be $1,500. These are identical to the exemptions in effect prior to 1989.

Mr. Speaker, we are all acutely aware of the enormous competitive challenges which this Nation faces from abroad. The trade deficit is a vivid reminder of how far we need to go. I believe that one clear way of meeting our competitive challenges is to give working Americans incentives to go back to school to sharpen their skills or to learn new ones. By taxing employer-provided education benefits, we are simply not providing those incentives now. My bill would.

I urge my colleagues to join in cosponsoring this important legislation.

MAKING THE SAVINGS AND LOAN INDUSTRY ACCOUNTABLE

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, it looks like the American taxpayer will be saddled with the burden of the mismanaged savings and loan industry. Regardless of which bailout plan is used, it can plainly be seen that it will be the American public, the taxpayer, who will foot the bill.

I oppose this, and I say it is time for the savings and loan industry to pay its own way. The working people of this country are barely surviving on a minimum wage that has not been raised since 1981.

I think it is time we spend some of our time on those people, not these big wheeler-dealer bankers. Let us face it. If Joe Sixpack ripped off the American Government like these big bankers did, he would never see the light of day.

I say the place to start is once and for all let us start burning these bankers and take the heat off of the American taxpayer.

HONORING OUR COMMITMENT TO OUR NATION'S VETERANS

(Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, as a nation we have made a pact with our veterans that we would always provide medical care for disabilities they suffered in our service. We have built up the world's largest health care service to make good on that promise.

But as our World War II veterans reach retirement age, more and more veterans require services. Over the last 8 years, the number of hospitalized veterans has increased 10 percent and the numbers using outpatient care have risen 34 percent. But during this same time Veterans' Administration [VA] medical funding has barely kept up with inflation. Our response has been to turn away those veterans who can afford private care for nonservice related disabilities. Today, fewer than 5 percent of the VA's patients can be classified as "discretionary" cases.

This means further cuts put the VA's basic mission at risk. If budget cuts force additional staff layoffs, use of inadequate equipment, postponement of needed facility repairs, and a shortage of medical supplies, we will be endangering our ability to serve the core VA population: those men and women who risked their lives and suffered injury for our freedom.

The deficit crisis demands we make every effort to cut out the waste in our budget. But continual cuts eventually will erode the level and quality of the services provided. Our unique debt to our veterans mandates a special level of scrutiny to ensure that the VA medical budget has the resources to meet the needs of our disabled veterans. As Congress makes decisions on this year's budget, we must be certain that we continue to honor our commitments to the Nation's veterans.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentlewoman's remarks today. We are having terrible problems in our VA hospital system, just as the gentlewoman has said. We are getting more patients, World War II veterans, Korean veterans and Vietnam veterans, research in AIDS, that they have to have more medical care.

We have had a straight line budget which has been recommended by the administrations over the years; no increase in funding; we have got to do something about it. The gentlewoman is right on target and I thank her for yielding.

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. I thank the chairman and I am sure under the chairman's leadership we will do something.

FEDERAL EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL PAY ADJUSTMENT ACT

(Mrs. MORELLA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, the extended debate over pay raise for the Nation's top officials has clouded the pressing salary issue—the steady drain of the Federal scientific cadre. The failure of Government salaries, including those at the highly skilled upper levels in research and management, to keep pace with inflation has already begun to result in a Federal "brain drain."

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which will give a pay raise for all who were included in the President's proposal, except for Members of Congress. My rationale is simple. A 51 percent pay raise at this time for Members at a time of fiscal restraint would have been excessive. Nevertheless, we must be able to recruit and retain the highest calibre of employees in the public sector and bring Federal pay scales in line with comparable private sector jobs.

My concern is for those in the Federal Government who are at the top of their professional level, yet are paid at the entry level of practicing lawyers, economists, doctors and scientists. Their expertise, management skills and authority far exceeds their peers in the private sector at that pay level, yet we have not seen fit to compensate them for their skills, performance, and duties. An elected official can only serve in the public sector. A scientists or judge can also serve in the private sector at a much more lucrative salary. Many of these dedicated people find it necessary to leave the public sector—even give up their retirement benefits—in order to earn enough for their growing families. One judge has said that he cannot afford to send his children to the same college where he received his education. Unfortunately, we are unable to recruit new talent with the same degree of expertise at the salary level which is offered in the Government.

The Nation loses when we lose our senior judges and scientists. The loss is not just the brain drain but also a loss to the taxpayer in terms of dollars. Take for example, a scientist who leaves the National Institutes of Health to join a pharmaceutical company conducting AIDS or cancer research—the same type of work that he or she was doing at NIH. No one fills the position because the pay is minimal and the responsibilities are enormous. The Government activity in the field slows down or stops. The Government feels the need to continue the work and so advertises for a consultant. The same scientist can, and often has, negotiated or bid for the position at a much higher rate than he or she was receiving because, under the procurement agreement, the Government can negotiate at whatever the market will bear.

The long-term effect, barring some major adjustment in salaries, could be a needless use of consultants to handle work now done by Federal employees.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government is a nonprofit organization. Our research is done at cost and is available for the good of the Nation. In contrast, when the Government contracts with the private sector the payment to that organization includes a profit and, often payment to their stockholders.

Unless something is done now, it is likely that critical members on Government research teams to combat AIDS and cancer, or leading scientists in space research, or our post-doctoral fellows setting industrial standards at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, and a long litany of others in all departments, will leave in large numbers because they believe that nothing will be done to help them alleviate their salary hardship until the next "Quad Comm" recommendation, 4 years from now.

Dr. Marc Lippman, who did outstanding research in breast cancer at NIH, left to join Georgetown University. Forty-five members of his staff went with him, including senior researchers, and doubled their salaries. NIH has lost 28 percent of its senior staff to the private sector during the last decade, including a Deputy Director and five Institute Directors, because they were attracted by salaries that paid 50 to 300 percent more. The median average compensation for senior physicians at medical colleges is $178,800. The current, supplemented median compensation for NIH SES physicians is $90,492.

The bill which I am introducing today will provide for a 20-percent pay increase for offices and positions covered by section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967, except for Members of Congress. It also provides that a study be conducted to determine whether appropriate pay relationships exist between the Senior Executive Service and the three highest grades of the General Schedule. There are Federal employees in the top GS grades who are deserving but, because of administrative decisions, have not been able to move into the SES cadre because of their quasi-judicial responsibilities.

The Senior Executive Service personnel will not receive the entire 20-percent pay raise. Because of the restrictions placed in Executive Order 12663 of January 6, 1989, the SES will receive a percentage of the 20-percent raise. This raise may not be enough incentive in the long range to retain and recruit some senior personnel. Rather, it is a temporary, but immediate, measure with the hope that those who are affected will consider this as good faith recognition of their endeavors.

JOINT MEETING OF CONGRESS TO COMMEMORATE THE CONGRESSIONAL BICENTENNIAL

(Mrs. BOGGS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind the Members of this body that on Thursday, this Thursday, March 2, at 10 a.m. in the House of Representatives, we will be enjoying a joint meeting of the House and Senate to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the date that the first Federal Congress met in New York 200 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, on this occasion in addition to the Speaker and the leadership of the House and Senate, the President pro tem of the Senate, the majority and minority leaders of both bodies and the Chaplains of both bodies, we will have an address by David McCullough, the distinguished author and lecturer who all of my colleagues I am sure have enjoyed as a narrator on the PBS special, "The Smithsonian World," and who recently was the keynote speaker for our congressional series, the opening on the various symposia on the Federal Congress. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, we will have Howard Nemerov who is the Poet Laureate of the United States. He is a consultant to the Library of Congress and professor at Washington University in St. Louis and he has composed a poem for the occasion entitled "to the Congress of the United States Entering Its Third Century."

This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the Poet Laureate of the United States has addressed the Congress.

There will be two other "firsts" as well. The first time stamp designs and the designs for coins will be unveiled here in the House Chamber. These stamps and these coins commemorating the bicentennial of the Congress, of course.

All throughout the program we will have appropriate music by the Army Band and I urge all of the Members to come and enjoy and participate in this historic occasion.

THE TRUE NATURE OF THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL TO LOWER THE TAX RATE ON CAPITAL GAINS

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, for the past few weeks, I have been trying to shed some light on the true nature of the President's proposal to lower the tax rate on capital gains. Despite claims that the move is intended to spur investment and enhance competitiveness, it is becoming increasingly clear that the proposal is a simple tax cut that will disproportionately benefit the highest-income taxpayers—nothing more and nothing less.

I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point a recent article by Newsweek economics columnist Robert J. Samuelson, who cuts through the President's rhetorical fog and exposes the proposal for its inequity and irresponsibility.

[From Newsweek, Mar. 6, 1989]

BRIBERY IS BAD POLICY

(By Robert J. Samuelson)

Every new administration has its own special economic enthusiasms. George Bush's is to cut the top tax on capital gains to 15 percent. He promises a glorious future of liberated entrepreneurs who will create new products and technologies. Employment and living standards would rise. American competitiveness would improve. It sounds great. Alas, this grand vision is so far removed from reality that it's almost fiction.

What Bush has proposed is the silliest sort of economic tinkering. If adopted, his plan would mostly provide a huge windfall to wealthy investors when they sell stock in existing corporations (as opposed to imaginative start-up companies). The effect on the nation's technological strength, competitiveness and total savings would be negligible—and might even be negative. Finally, the proposal would probably cost the Treasury billions of dollars annually in revenues precisely when the government needs every penny to cut its budget deficits.

Capital gains are the profits on the sales of stocks, bonds, other financial assets or property. The tax is now the same as on ordinary income—a top rate of 28 percent or, in some cases, 33 percent. In effect, Bush wants to bribe Americans into taking bigger risks. Give investors, managers and inventors a lower tax rate, the theory goes, and they'll put more of their money and time into the nifty start-up companies that will produce the next biotechnology breakthrough or computer chip. To favor productive investment, Bush's lower capital-gains rates would apply mostly to profits on stocks and would not cover gains from collectibles (art, antiques, coins) or real estate.

The trouble is that Bush's bribes probably won't attract much extra investment money into new high-tech companies, as economist James Poterba of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology notes. Much of the early financing for these companies comes from venture-capital funds that now control about $34 billion. Individuals—who would be the only beneficiaries of the lower capital-gains rate—provide a tiny share of venture-capital money. Since 1980 it's average 16 percent. The rest comes from tax-exempt investment pools such as pension funds and university endowments, or from corporations and foreign investors. These investors wouldn't be affected by Bush's plan.

True, a lower capital-gains rate might help new start-up companies lure talented managers or scientists from larger corporations. "When they're trying to recruit senior managers, these small companies can't pay big salaries," says Jane Morris of Venture Economics, Inc. The magnet is stock options. Executives can buy at low prices. If the company succeeds, the stock's price multiplies. Managers can become millionaires. Obviously, the tax rate affects their potential profit and willingness to take the risk.

Everybody rightly admires the triumphs of start-up companies; Apple Computer or Federal Express. But there's a downside. The executives who leave bigger corporations—the IBM's, Hewlett-Packards or Johnson & Johnsons—to make their millions also do damage. They have managed research labs, new products or entire divisions. Their departures create gaps and may be demoralizing. Some industrial specialists now think that excessive loss of key managers hurts U.S. companies in global competition.

Is it better to promote more start-ups, or to strengthen major corporations? It's impossible to say. The tax system shouldn't try to arbitrate this competition. It should stay neutral. People should decide on the basis of business, not tax considerations. All start-ups don't work. Bribing top-notch managers or researchers to join a failure is wasteful.

Even if a lower capital-gains rate helped new high-tech companies, that wouldn't be its main effect. Economist Poterba estimates that the capital gains created by startup companies probably constitute less than 1 percent of all capital gains. Most profits are generated by selling stocks in well-established corporations. And so the other main argument for cutting the capital-gains tax is that it would improve the low U.S. savings rate. This, too, is unlikely.

The theory sounds logical. People would put more money into the stock market because they could keep more of the profits. But people might simply shift savings from other sources. Or the theory might not work at all. The lower tax rates of the 1981 and 1986 tax laws were supposed to raise savings for the same reason—people could keep more of their interest or dividend income. It didn't happen. From 1982 to 1988, personal savings have averaged 4.9 percent of disposable income. That's the lowest level since World War II. Maybe people saved less because a risking stock market made them feel richer. No one really knows.

LARGE LOSSES?

The lesson is that it isn't easy to manipulate the economy with the tax code. The danger is that the Bush plan do more harm than good. Economists disagree over whether it would reduce government revenues. The dispute revolves around whether the losses from lower rates would be offset by a greater volume of stock sales (and, therefore, of profits to be taxed). Even the administration forecasts a $200 million loss of revenues between now and 1999, with early gains offset by large losses later. After that, small increases are forecast. By contrast, the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation thinks losses will probably exceed $5 million annually.

Any cuts would mostly benefit the rich, who are the largest individual owners of stock. In 1985 taxpayers with more than $200,000 of income accounted for 46 percent of capital gains; taxpayers with less than $30,000 of income accounted for only 15 percent. Worse, the Bush proposal could subvert the 1986 tax reform. Its wise premise was that the tax law should be used sparingly to promote specific social or economic objectives. So tax rates were lowered, and some preferences—credits, deductions and the special capital-gains rate—were eliminated. Restoring the special capital-gains tax encourages the kind of unproductive tax maneuvering that the 1986 law sought to deter.

All that Bush has done is to redeem an ill-advised campaign pledge. By pushing it, the president risks portraying himself as a stooge for the rich. He's also angered key congressional Democrats who helped craft the 1986 tax law. And for what? The plan's virtues are hypothetical and distant, while its vices are real and close at hand.

LACK OF MANAGERIAL, FARM SYSTEM, MANY OTHER MINOR APPOINTMENTS IN PROFESSIONAL BASEBALL

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, major league baseball's pathetic record in the hiring of minorities in front office, managerial and coaching positions may soon be a thing of the past.

Last week several members of the Black and Hispanic Caucuses led by Representative TOWNS and myself had a productive and encouraging meeting with incoming major league baseball Commissioner Bart Giamatti. The commissioner-elect, who begins service April 1st, assured us that as far as his social agenda is concerned—a top priority will be the hiring of more minorities. At this point there are no black or Hispanic general managers and only one black farm director. There are only two minority managers in the major leagues.

Specifically, Giamatti is considering setting up a program to train minority coaches. Owner's hiring practices will be closely scrutinized making sure a concerted effort is made to open up all positions to all applicants. In an effort to increase minority ownership, Giamatti wants to put together a list of potential minority buyers in each major league city. The new commissioner also agreed to increase the number of minority college students who do internships with major league baseball.

While Giamatti appears committed to expunge racism from major league baseball—it's the owners who do the hiring. This is why members of the Hispanic and Black Caucuses will continue to closely monitor baseball's owners and the new commissioner to make sure more minorities are hired in front office, managerial and coaching positions.

Commissioner-elect Giamatti has made a promising start and we salute him. We especially commend him for enlisting former Secretary of the Army Clifford Alexander and Janet Hill to pursue these goals. Hopefully Commissioner Giamatti will also enlist a Hispanic component for this team.

BAN ALCOHOL IN AUTOMOBILES

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, every 23 minutes another person is killed on American roads by a drunk driver. Last year we made some progress in legislation I and others introduced, to try and provide incentives to the States to get drunk drivers off the road, and particularly to deal with the open container laws that need to be tightened all across this country.

It is interesting that 15 States in this country allow people to drink while they drive. Let me rephrase that. Fifteen States say it is all right for people to drink while they drive. Another 23 States allow people in the car to be drinking. It is interesting that a driver can go from the New Hampshire-Canadian border, down into Florida using a meandering route, and from Florida to the Western part of the United States, and either drink himself or have somebody in the car drinking all the way. This makes no sense at all.

I think we ought to enact legislation that requires the States to pass legislation at the State level banning open containers in automobiles. I have introduced such a bill (H.R. 1092) and urge my colleagues to cosponsor it. Alcohol in automobiles does not mix. Driving should not accompany drinking under any circumstances, and I hope this Congress, the 101st Congress, will take tougher action on driving and drinking to the benefit of all the American people.

TRAUMA CARE SYSTEMS PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT ACT

(Mr. BATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I recently introduced legislation which passed the House in the 100th session of Congress, but time did not permit consideration by the Senate of this legislation. The Trauma Care Systems Planning and Development Act of 1989 will encourage States to develop regional trauma centers and enhance systems of emergency medical care. It will save 20,000 lives each year.

Trauma, the medical term for severe injury, kills 140,000 persons each year. Among Americans under the age of 44, trauma is the leading cause of death. The economic costs as well as the human costs to our Nation are enormous, yet trauma can be largely prevented. In 1985, a San Diego County study found that after the 1984 introduction of a regional trauma care system, the death rate from major trauma dropped 55 percent. Unfortunately, the life saving services of a regional trauma center are unavailable to over 80 percent of our constituents. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 436.

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS' SWINDLE

(Mr. OWENS of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, now is the time for all good conservatives to come to the aid of the Nation. The introduction of socialism into the banking industry represents a grave threat to the economy of the country. This socialism in the banking industry is a very expensive governmental intervention in the form of the proposals that are being discussed presently to bail out savings and loan association crisis.

Some people call it a crisis. I call it a swindle. The latest estimate is that $150 billion will be needed, and we are still climbing. Already the Danny Wall gang has committed as much as $50 billion, $50 billion to bail out failing savings and loan associations. This gigantic savings and loan association swindle is a dragon that will eat all efforts to eliminate the deficit. This gigantic savings and loan association swindle is a dragon that will eat all initiatives, all new initiatives in any area, whether it is education, energy, cleanups or the repeal of the surtax in the catastrophic health care program.

Now is the time for all good conservatives to join with all good liberals to come to the aid of the taxpayers. The very last segment of a population that we need to subsidize are the bankers. Corrupt bankers or incompetent bankers are the least deserving of being subsidized and we should resolve not to allow $150 billion of the taxpayers' money to bail out this corrupt industry.

AUTHORIZING PRINTING OF THE COMMITTEE PRINT ENTITLED "REPORT OF THE TASK FORCE ON FOREIGN ASSISTANCE"

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 92) authorizing the printing of the committee print entitled "Report of the Task Force on Foreign Assistance" as a House document and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 92

Resolved, That the committee print entitled "Report of the Task Force on Foreign Assistance," dated February 1989, shall be printed as a House document. In addition to the usual number, 3,000 copies of the document shall be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of yielding to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. BATES] to tell us the purpose of his resolution. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BATES] for that purpose.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides for the printing of 3,000 copies of a document entitled "Report of the Task Force on Foreign Assistance." The Committee on Foreign Affairs has exhausted its supply and has asked for 3,000 additional copies. The cost for the additional copies will be $1,122. The request comes from Chairman HAMILTON and is supported by the ranking minority member of the Task Force, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution. Early last year, we were asked by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], to review the performance of U.S. foreign assistance programs and the report culminating our efforts was issued earlier this month. Its apparent popularity has resulted in the total depletion of our stock.

There continues to be significant demand for the report and I ask my colleagues to support our resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of this document.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 92, the resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ESTABLISHING THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER, THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH AND FAMILIES, AND THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON NARCOTICS ABUSE AND CONTROL

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 84 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 84

Resolved,

TITLE I—SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 101. There is hereby established in the House of Representatives a select committee to be known as the Select Committee on Hunger (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "select committee").

FUNCTIONS

SEC. 102. (a) The select committee shall not have legislative jurisdiction. The select committee shall have authority—

(1) to conduct a continuing comprehensive study and review of the problems of hunger and malnutrition, including but not limited to, those issues addressed in the reports of the Presidential Commission on World Hunger and the Independent Commission on International Development Issues, which issues include—

(A) the United States development and economic assistance program and the executive branch structure responsible for administering the program;

(B) world food security;

(C) trade relations between the United States and less developed countries;

(D) food production and distribution;

(E) corporate agribusiness efforts to further international development;

(F) policies of multilateral development banks and international development institutions; and

(G) food assistance programs in the United States;

(2) to review any recommendations made by the President, or by any department or agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government, relating to programs or policies affecting hunger or malnutrition; and

(3) to recommend to the appropriate committees of the House legislation or other action the select committee considers necessary with respect to programs or policies affecting hunger or malnutrition.

(b) Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to limit or alter the legislative and oversight jurisdiction of any standing committee of the House under rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

APPOINTMENT AND MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 103. (a) The select committee shall be composed of thirty Members of the House, who shall be appointed by the Speaker, one of whom he shall designate as chairman.

(b) Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the select committee shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) For purposes of this section, the term "Members" shall include any Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the House of Representatives.

AUTHORITY AND PROCEDURES

SEC. 104. (a) For the purpose of carrying out this title, the select committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, including any Commonwealth or possession thereof, or elsewhere, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings as it deems necessary.

(b) The provisions of clauses 1, 2, and 3 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives shall apply to the select committee except the provisions of clause 2(m)(1)(B) of rule XI relating to subpoena power.

(c) Nothing contained in subsection (a) of this section shall be construed to limit the applicability of clause 2(i) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives to the select committee.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 105. (a) Subject to the adoption of expense resolutions as required by clause 5 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the select committee may incur expenses in connection with its duties under this title.

(b) In carrying out its functions under this title, the select committee is authorized—

(1) to appoint, either on a permanent basis or as experts or consultants, such staff as the select committee considers necessary;

(2) to utilize the services of the staffs of those committees of the House from which Members have been selected for membership on the select committee;

(3) to prescribe the duties and responsibilities of such staff;

(4) to fix the compensation of such staff at a single per annum gross rate which does not exceed the highest rate of basic pay, as in effect from time to time, of level V of the Executive Schedule in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code;

(5) to terminate the employment of any such staff as the select committee considers appropriate; and

(6) to reimburse members of the select committee and of its staff for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties and responsibilities for the select committee, other than expenses in connection with any meeting of the select committee held in the District of Columbia.

REPORTS AND RECORDS

SEC. 106. (a) The select committee shall submit an annual report to the House which shall include a summary of the activities of the select committee during the calendar year to which the report applies.

(b) Any such report which is made when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

(c) The records, files, and materials of the select committee shall be transferred to the Clerk of the House.

TITLE II—SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND FAMILIES

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 201. There is hereby established in the House of Representatives a select committee to be known as the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "select committee").

FUNCTIONS

SEC. 202. (a) The select committee shall not have legislative jurisdiction. The select committee shall have authority—

(1) to conduct a continuing comprehensive study and review of the problems of children, youth, and families, including but not limited to income maintenance, health (including medical and child development research), nutrition, education, welfare, employment, and recreation;

(2) to study the use of all practical means and methods of encouraging the development of public and private programs and policies which will assist American children and youth in taking a full part in national life and becoming productive citizens; and

(3) to develop policies that would encourage the coordination of both governmental and private programs designed to address the problems of childhood and adolescence.

(b) Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to limit or alter the legislative and oversight jurisdiction of any standing committee of the House under rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

APPOINTMENT AND MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 203. (a) The select committee shall be composed of no more than thirty Members of the House, who shall be appointed by the Speaker, and one of whom he shall designate as chairman.

(b) Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the select committee shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) For purposes of this section, the term "Members" shall include any Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the House of Representatives.

AUTHORITY AND PROCEDURES

SEC. 204. (a) For the purpose of carrying out its responsibilities under this title, the select committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, including any Commonwealth or possession thereof, or elsewhere, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings as it deems necessary.

(b) The provisions of clauses 1, 2, and 3 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives shall apply to the select committee.

(c) Nothing contained in subsection (a) of this section shall be construed to limit the applicability of clause 2(i) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives to the select committee.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 205. (a) Subject to the adoption of expense resolutions as required by clause 5 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the select committee may incur expenses in connection with its duties under this title.

(b) In carrying out its functions under this title, the select committee is authorized—

(1) to appoint, either on a permanent basis or as experts or consultants, such staff as the select committee considers necessary;

(2) to utilize the services of the staffs of those committees of the House from which Members have been selected for membership on the select committee;

(3) to prescribe the duties and responsibilities of such staff;

(4) to fix the compensation of such staff at a single per annum gross rate which does not exceed the highest rate of basic pay, as in effect from time to time, of level V of the Executive Schedule in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code;

(5) to terminate the employment of any such staff as the select committee considers appropriate; and

(6) to reimburse members of the select committee and of its staff for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties and responsibilities for the select committee, other than expenses in connection with any meeting of the select committee held in the District of Columbia.

REPORTS AND RECORDS

SEC. 206. (a) The select committee shall report to the House as soon as practicable during the present Congress, the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

(b) Any such report which is made when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

(c) Any such report shall be referred to the committee or committees having jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof.

(d) The records, files, and materials of the select committee shall be transferred to the Clerk of the House.

TITLE III—SELECT COMMITTEE ON NARCOTICS ABUSE AND CONTROL

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 301. There is hereby established in the House of Representatives a select committee to be known as the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "select committee").

FUNCTIONS

SEC. 302. The select committee shall not have legislative jurisdiction. The select committee shall have authority—

(1) to conduct a continuing oversight and review of the problems of narcotics, drug, and polydrug abuse and control, including (but not limited to) the study and review of (A) the abuse and control of opium and its derivatives, other narcotic drugs, psychotropics, and other controlled substances, as defined in the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, and any such drug or substance when used in combination with any other substance; (B) domestic and international trafficking, manufacturing, and distribution; (C) treatment, prevention, and rehabilitation; (D) narcotics-related violations of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986; (E) international treaties and agreements relating to the control of narcotics and drug abuse; (F) the role of organized crime in narcotics and drug abuse; (G) problems of narcotics and drug abuse and control in the Armed Forces of the United States; (H) problems of narcotics and drug abuse and control in industry; and (I) the approach of the criminal justice system with respect to narcotics and drug law violations and crimes related to drug abuse;

(2) to review any recommendations made by the President, or by any department or agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government, relating to programs or policies affecting narcotics or drug abuse or control; and

(3) to recommend to the appropriate committees of the House legislation or other action the select committee considers necessary with respect to programs or policies affecting narcotics or drug abuse or control.

APPOINTMENT AND MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 303. (a) The select committee shall be composed of thirty Members of the House, who shall be appointed by the Speaker, one of whom he shall designate as chairman. At least one member of the select committee shall be chosen from each of the following committees of the House: The Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Energy and Commerce, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and the Committee on Ways and Means.

(b) Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the select committee shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) For purposes of this section, the term "Members" shall include any Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the House of Representatives.

AUTHORITY AND PROCEDURES

SEC. 304. (a) For the purpose of carrying out this title, the select committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, including any Commonwealth or possession thereof, or elsewhere, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings as it deems necessary.

(b) The provisions of clauses 1, 2, and 3 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives shall apply to the select committee.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 305. (a) Subject to the adoption of expense resolutions as required by clause 5 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the select committee may incur expenses in connection with its duties under this title.

(b) In carrying out its functions under this title, the select committee is authorized—

(1) to appoint, either on a permanent basis or as experts or consultants, such staff as the select committee considers necessary;

(2) to prescribe the duties and responsibilities of such staff;

(3) to fix the compensation of such staff at a single per annum gross rate which does not exceed the highest rate of basic pay, as in effect from time to time, of level V of the Executive Schedule in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code;

(4) to terminate the employment of any such staff as the select committee considers appropriate; and

(5) to reimburse members of the select committee and of its staff for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties and responsibilities for the select committee, other than expenses in connection with any meeting of the select committee held in the District of Columbia.

REPORTS

SEC. 306. (a)(1) The select committee shall report to the House with respect to the results of any field investigation or inspection it conducts.

(2) The select committee shall submit an annual report to the House which shall include a summary of the activities of the select committee during the calendar year to which the report applies.

(3) The select committee shall report to the House its recommendations for a comprehensive program to control the worldwide problem of drug abuse and drug trafficking.

(b) Any such report which is made when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. PEPPER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, there has been expressed by Members in the House a desire that we should have a little longer time for the consideration of this resolution relating to these 3 matters, and therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the consideration of this resolution, instead of 1 hour, be extended to 1½ hours.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to this, but I would ask the chairman of the Rules Committee if he intends to yield half of the additional time as well to the minority.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the time will be an hour and a half, with 45 minutes to be used by the chairman of the committee and 45 minutes to be reserved for the minority.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 1½ hours.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, in bringing this resolution before the House, it has been the intention of the Committee on Rules to ask for division of the question so that the House may vote separately on each of the three titles of the resolution. This resolution in the exercise of the original jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules, would lay before the House the proposal to extend three of the select committees of the House, one on children, one on hunger, and one on narcotics.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, at this time I demand that the question on House Resolution 84 be divided so that there may be a separate vote on each of the three titles of the resolution. That will have the effect of giving the House the opportunity to vote on each of the three committees separately.

The SPEAKER. The question will be divided, and there will be three votes, one applicable to each of the committees concerned in the resolution.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary one-half of the time allotted, that is, 45 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume. Of course, I yield for the purpose of debate only.

Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SOLOMON] pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 84 would establish three House select committees for the 101st Congress: The Select Committee on Hunger; the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families; and the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

None of the select committees would have legislative jurisdiction but each would be charged with the responsibility of studying problems in their respective subject areas and recommending practical solutions to the House. Each select committee will be composed of 30 members. The Speaker appoints members to the select committees and will designate one of those members from each select committee to serve as chairman.

The select committees would be authorized to sit and act and would be bound by the House rules which relate to standing committees. Each select committee could hire staff and incur expenses only upon the adoption by the House of a separate funding resolution reported from the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. Speaker, the report accompanying this resolution inadvertently states that the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families will not have subpoena power. The Rules Committee intends, as provided by the language contained in section 204 of House Resolution 84, that the Select Committee be authorized to issue subpoenas. I hope that this will clear up any confusion as to the select committee's authority.

The House has authorized the establishment of these select committees in past Congresses and the Rules Committee feels that their establishment once again is an important step which the House of the 101st Congress ought to take.

Mr. Speaker, as all of our colleagues are aware, there are many serious problems which face our country and the world. Of these problems, hunger is the most acute, persistent, and difficult to solve. Since the end of World War II our Nation has endeavored to find ways to solve the problem of hunger and malnutrition. More than 40,000 people die each day of hunger or complications related to severe malnutrition. That amounts to a staggering 14.6 million people annually. In 1980 alone, the World Bank estimates that 730 million people were unable to obtain enough food to consistently maintain good health. By establishing the Select Committee on Hunger, the House will demonstrate its continuing commitment to seek out practical solutions that can make an impact on hunger and its consequences. In the past three Congresses, the Select Committee on Hunger and its task forces on international hunger have brought such proposals before the legislative committees of the House. Enactment of House Resolution 84 will allow the Select Committee to continue to provide this valuable service to the House.

Mr. Speaker, the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families which House Resolution 84 would establish is well-suited to deal with a number of other crises our Nation faces. The Select Committee investigations in the last Congress revealed that the proportion of children living in poverty continues to increase at an alarming rate. Lack of affordable child care is a major deterrent to mothers and particularly single mothers in their ability to work. Surprisingly, the fastest growing homeless group are families with children. The Education Department reported a couple of weeks ago that over 220,000 school-age children are homeless. Estimates made by the National Coalition for the Homeless place the total number of homeless children between 500,000 and 750,000. According to the Census Bureau the number of children who live in single-parent homes has increased by 2 million since 1986. Another issue which I have been especially concerned about is long-term care for children who are disabled or chronically ill. The Select Committee has played a major role in identifying these problems, helping Congress understand their cause, and providing leadership in the pursuit of adequate solutions which are both compassionate and cost-effective.

Reestablishment of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families will allow the House to continue to benefit from the expertise which has been demonstrated by its members. Historically, our Nation has found its strength within the family. Therefore, it is our duty to continue to develop policies which address the causes of the problems which destroy the family.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out, by the way, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND], as the previous chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, has done a magnificent job in that critical area. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has also done an extraordinarily good job in bringing to the attention of the Congress and the country the problems facing the children and families of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the work and accomplishments of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control are well known. The select committee under the able leadership of its chairman, Mr. RANGEL, has led the way in the Congress' continued commitment to the war on drugs.

The pervasive and destructive nature of illegal drug abuse continues to tear at the fabric of our society. Illegal narcotics continue to cross our borders at record levels, while at the same time domestic production accelerates rapidly. Today, an estimated 6.5 million Americans abuse drugs. This abuse results in $100 billion in lost productivity annually and is the basic cause of the dramatic surge in the rate of violent crime.

The Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control played a major role in the development of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 and 1988 by advocating new initiatives in all facets of our Nation's response to this terrible phenomenon. The value of their oversight and advice to the House cannot be measured.

For example, one of the outstanding accomplishments of the efforts toward drug legislation in recent days is the establishment in the White House of a so-called drug czar, somebody who has central authority over their operation of the whole program.

Now, as the effects of recent legislation begin to take hold, it is imperative that we reconstitute the select committee in order that they may continue to advise the House on any modifications or additions in law which are needed to help end the crisis of drug abuse in our Nation.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of that subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL], for the magnificent leadership he has given to this critical committee.

So, Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would urge my colleagues to adopt this resolution and agree to the establishment of these select committees. It would be a critical first step in the development of solutions to the many problems which face our country today. I think these committees are deserving of the continued support of this House, and I urge my colleagues to approve this resolution today. Let us reconstitute these very distinguished select committees, supported as they have been by their very able leadership.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Madam Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution. I do so not necessarily because of the substance of what it contains, but rather as a protest against the process that brought it to the floor as a privileged resolution.

It was my hope, and indeed the hope of other members on the Rules Committee, that this resolution could have been brought to the floor under an open rule. An open rule could have provided for a minimum of 1 hour of debate on each of these three select committees, and it would have permitted amendments.

As it is, however, reporting House Resolution 84 as a privileged resolution has the effect of bringing it to the floor under a closed rule. I realize that a division of the question can be asked for, with a separate vote on each committee. But, even so, we would still be limited to a total of only one hour of debate to discuss the merits of all three select committees put together.

And so a vote for this resolution is, in my view, a vote for a closed rule. Therefore, I must oppose this resolution on those grounds.

Madam Speaker, I would now like to make a few brief observations about the importance of what we are considering here this afternoon. In my view, reconstituting the Select Committees on Hunger, Narcotics Abuse, and Families should not be simply just another routine matter.

As I noted a moment ago, an open rule would have permitted the House to discuss the merits of these three committees.

There are some Members, for example, who believe very strongly that the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control should be elevated to the status of a standing committee, with authority to report legislation. The fight against illegal drugs and the scourge of narcotics addiction is perhaps the one single issue which has gained the attention of every public official in America.

But this "business as usual" way of doing things around here precludes us from debating this issue today. Has the congressional response to the drug crisis in America been adequate? I believe we should debate that question.

There are other Members who believe that our entire committee system is long overdue for a thorough review. As every Member knows, the congressional budget process has become so time-consuming and complicated that the authorizing committees have found their authority and roles in the legislative process being steadily eroded.

Does the establishment of select committees serve to diminish even further the role of standing committees? This is another vital question that needs to be debated.

Yet another issue, Madam Speaker, that members are concerned about is the very nature of the select committees themselves. The guidelines for establishing such committees that were set forth by the Rules Committee in 1977 contain specific provisions about limited time periods for the existence of select committees and narrowly defined subject matter for their consideration.

We all know that the present committee system is fraught with duplication, overlap, and inefficiency. Have select committees become a part of the problem? Judging from the survey of activities that were filed with the Rules Committee, it would seem that these three select committees have agendas which are just as diffuse and as virtually unlimited as the standing committees.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would just note that Members of the 101st Congress were sworn into office 8 weeks ago today. We haven't done much since then. There should have been adequate time to really figure out what it is that we should be doing around here. There is a tremendous need to make our entire committee system more rational. That is the real issue here today, and the reason why I am distressed about what is, in effect, a closed rule, with so little time to really debate these issues on the merits and no opportunity for amendments.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my distinguished colleague and friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of title I of House Resolution 84, which establishes in this Congress the Select Committee on Hunger. This title of the resolution incorporates House Resolution 20, of which I am pleased to be an original cosponsor.

I have been a longtime supporter of the Select Committee on Hunger, and I have enjoyed the privilege of chairing its international task force since the Select Committee's inception in 1984.

Before the creation of the Select Committee on Hunger, jurisdiction over hunger issues was divided among 8 of the 22 standing committees and numerous subcommittees. Creation of the Select Committee on Hunger has provided a single, unified forum for the consideration of the diverse issues related to hunger—both domestic and international.

There is no question that hunger continues to be a critical issue that merits the special focus of the U.S. Congress. Each day, 40,000 people die of hunger and complications related to severe malnutrition. An estimated 14.6 million people die from hunger and malnutrition each year. More than 20 million people here in the United States, including 4 million children, go hungry at some point during each month.

Since 1984, the Select Committee on Hunger has made important contributions to the work of the Congress on issues relating to both domestic and international hunger. The record demonstrates that the Select Committee's work has complemented that of the standing committees with jurisdiction over hunger. As the Select Committee's progress report on its activities in the 100th Congress indicates, it has succeeded in directing attention to issues that might not have received such congressional consideration without its work. There are many examples of this that I could cite, but I would like to take a moment to highlight just a few that were of special interest to me in the 100th Congress.

Domestically, the Select Committee made several contributions to provisions of the Emergency Hunger Prevention Act of 1988—Public Law 100-435. Hearings by the Select Committee on Hunger led to legislation which was incorporated into this law to encourage greater use of farmers markets to bring nutritious commodities to low-income women, infants, and children. The Hunger Committee also participated in the crafting of provisions of Public Law 100-435 designed to simplify application procedures for food stamps, Medicaid, and aid to families with dependent children [AFDC].

I was especially pleased that the Emergency Hunger Prevention Act included provisions based on my bill to establish a national gleaning clearinghouse within the Department of Agriculture. The Select Committee had been working with me since the 99th Congress on hearings and legislation to promote the gleaning of surplus farm crops for use in private emergency food distribution programs. As signed into law, the gleaning provisions authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to provide technical aid to State and local agencies for encouraging public and private nonprofit agency involvement in gleaning programs, and for collecting and sharing information relating to gleaning efforts.

As chairman of the International Task Force, I am especially pleased by the contributions made by the Select Committee to numerous international hunger issues. In the 100th Congress, I had introduced H.R. 1693, the Global Basic Education Enhancement Act. Funding provisions of the Foreign Aid Appropriations Act (P.L. 100-461) reflected the thrust of this bill and of other basic education activities of the Select Committee. For fiscal 1989, there is an earmark of $64.7 million for basic primary and secondary education spending by AID. This follows an earmark of $42 million in fiscal 1988. It is my hope that this type of funding commitment demonstrates a growing consensus about the vital role of basic education in efforts to sustain development in Third World nations.

Since fiscal 1985, the Select Committee has made prominent contributions to securing increased support for the Child Survival Fund. Last year, the Select Committee called attention to a disturbing trend in AID's support for child survival activities: a decline of 20 percent in funding for these activities, including a 30 percent decline in child survival spending for African children, from fiscal 1987 to fiscal 1988. The Select Committee worked with the Foreign Operations Subcommittee on language in the Foreign Aid Appropriations Act to encourage AID to increase funding for child survival activities—and especially those for African children—in fiscal 1989 to a level at least as high as that of fiscal 1987.

In the 100th Congress, the Select Committee on Hunger continued its strong support for programs to combat both blindness and malnutrition through the increased use of vitamin A. An earmark of $8 million for AID's Vitamin A Deficiency Program was included in the fiscal 1989 foreign aid appropriation.

The Select Committee also supported initiatives to achieve the worldwide eradication of Guinea worm disease and to increase the U.S. commitment to fight river blindness.

Further, the Select Committee advocated an earmark of $75 million for micro-enterprise credit in the fiscal 1989 foreign aid appropriations legislation—an amount which ultimately was approved.

I was pleased to work with Select Committee on Hunger Chairman MICKEY LELAND on legislative initiatives, such as H.R. 4049, to promote the role of women in development. I also worked with Chairman LELAND on measures to address food emergencies in Sudan, Ethiopia, Uganda, Somalia, Mozambique, Angola, and other African nations.

With respect to Ethiopia, I was grateful that 232 of my colleagues joined as cosponsors of House Concurrent Resolution 237, a resolution I introduced to encourage early action to prevent the loss of life in Ethiopia and other drought-stricken nations in sub-Saharan Africa. I also appreciated the opportunity to work with the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. ROUKEMA) on an initiative to urge the Soviet Union to use its influence with the Ethiopian Government to help secure the delivery of food relief to the needy in the embattled regions of Ethiopia.

In regard to other international emergencies, I was honored to have the opportunity to travel to Bangladesh at the request of the Select Committee and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to assess the aftermath of the serious flooding in that country. I intend to continue to work with my colleagues on further initiatives, relating to Bangladesh.

These are just some of the efforts of the Select Committee of particular interest to me. I believe they have helped to save lives and to improve the health and nutrition of those in need throughout the world.

While the Select Committee on Hunger already has made significant contributions to hunger and health issues, both domestic and international, it is clear that there is much work ahead of us. The Select Committee has identified a number of issues and projects to be pursued in 101st Congress. I believe we continue to need the work of the Select Committee on Hunger to assist the Congress in responding to the many challenges that face our country and the rest of the world in matters relating to hunger, health, and poverty alleviation.

The solid record of the Select Committee demonstrates that it has an important role to play in this 101st Congress. I urge my colleagues to support the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger, as provided in Title I of House Resolution 84.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to our distinguished Republican minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, a select committee is the House's way of adjusting to the crises of our times. Select committees, at their best, offer us a flexibility and a sense of focus that we may otherwise not find in our standing committees.

Having said that, let me address some problems I see in our efforts to fight drugs, the most notable example of which is the Select Committee on Narcotics.

The Select Committee on Narcotics serves a useful purpose of initially highlighting the issue of drugs and of providing information. But we are now at that juncture where the fight against drugs needs more than information. It needs coordination. It requires cooperation, and there has to be planning guidance and a sense of direction. All of these are currently lacking in the House.

We have 53 House committees and subcommittees with oversight responsibility for some aspect of the antidrug program.

This doesn't include appropriations, select, task force and other nonstanding committees.

None of these groups coordinate their objectives, policies, hearings, schedules, funding proposals or messages. They all shout "Listen to Me" but none stop to listen.

If the drug criminals ran their operations in such a messy fashion, they'd be out of business in a week. They are organized but we're not.

Drug policy in the House is a labyrinth inside a maze, inside a jungle.

Do we really expect to drop at the doorstep of our new drug czar, William Bennett, all this complexity and then say: from here on, you are on your own? He deserves something more—something better—than that. So does President Bush. And so do millions of Americans who want to see this drug fight in Congress get its act together.

We tell the public: "Look at the great drug bills we've passed." But what we don't tell the public is this:

The 1986 and 1988 drug bills are comprehensive bills that simply list the individual policies of all major committees. They are not coordinated policies.

They are simply the separate opinions of at least 11 different committees lumped together under one bill number.

Intercommittee disputes were resolved for purposes of this bill, but no permanent resolution mechanisms were put in place.

There is an old Gershwin brothers song whose lyrics say:

"You say to-May-toe and I say Tah-Mah-Toe—let's call the whole thing off."

Well, we are all saying and doing different things about drugs—but we can't call the whole thing off. There is too much at stake. We have to speak and act in a much more harmonious way.

We must recognize that the select committee is good at highlighting the need for coordination by the administration, but is impotent when it comes to eliminating the greatest barrier to coordination: Hill policy run amok.

The select committee cannot coordinate legislative committees because it lacks both legislative authority, and its membership is not designed to represent each of the relevant legislative committees and subcommittees.

That is why today I have sent a letter to President Bush and a copy to the Speaker urging the creation of an ad hoc committee on drug policy to serve as the focal point for antidrug legislation. This committee would be the vehicle to consider administration initiatives on antidrug legislation.

The ad hoc committee would serve several purposes. It would enable the administration to work more effectively with the Congress on drug policy. It would eliminate overlap and duplication in the House, and it would surely expedite consideration of any new legislation on drug abuse.

I would assume that the members of the committees with primary jurisdiction over drug policy would play a key role in the ad hoc committee, but I have no doubt that the vast majority of Republicans and Democrats with a keen interest in the drug problem will recognize the urgent need for coordination and consolidation.

The most effective step we can take in the battle against drug abuse is to legislate policies that will work on the streets, not on paper.

I am submitting my letter to the President for the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 27, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I will meet later this week with Bill Bennett to discuss an effective means of implementing your anti-drug abuse strategy.

I have no doubt that among your initiatives in this area will be a call for expedited action from the Congress on a variety of drug-related issues not fully addressed by the bill we enacted in the 100th Congress. It is my hope that these initiatives will receive prompt action in the House; however, the potential for a continuation of the piecemeal and cumbersome approach the House has taken is significant. As I understand it, there are more than 53 committees and subcommittees in the House that lay claim to jurisdiction over some aspect of the drug problem. This unreasonably large number does not include appropriations subcommittees, select committees, or task forces.

Jurisdictional overlap of this magnitude has increasingly frustrated implementation of an effective anti-drug policy. Creation of the Office of National Drug Control Policy and your appointment of Bill Bennett was in response to a need for greater coordination at the Federal level.

Now Congress must impose a discipline upon itself. Secretary Bennett cannot coordinate the efforts of agencies and departments that are implementing inconsistent policies in response to one or more of the 53 subcommittees in the House.

Mr. President, I hope that you will consider asking the Speaker of the House to exercise his authority under the House Rules to create an Ad Hoc Committee on Drug Policy to serve as the focal point for anti-drug legislation.

The Ad Hoc Committee would serve several purposes: It would enable the Administration to work more effectively with the Congress on drug policy; it would eliminate overlap and duplication in the House, and it would surely expedite consideration of any new legislation on drug abuse.

I would assume that the Members of the committee with primary jurisdiction over drug policy would play a key role in the Ad Hoc Committee, but I have no doubt that the vast majority of Republicans and Democrats with a keen interest in the drug problem will recognize the urgent need for coordination and consolidation.

The most effective step we can take in the battle against drug abuse is to legislate policies that will work on the streets, not on paper.

I firmly believe that this type of congressional restructuring is essential to the success of the new Office of Drug Control Policy.

I fully intend to take this matter up with Bill Bennett this week, Mr. President, and I hope that you will have a moment to consider this approach prior to our meeting.

Sincerely,

ROBERT H. MICHEL,
Republican Leader.

□ 1250

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

Mr. RANGEL. Madam Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution; but before the minority leader leaves, I would like to tell him why I think that he is dead wrong.

First of all, we do not have legislative responsibility. We have not sought legislative responsibility. In all the years that we have had the select committee, we, like you, have hoped that there would be no need for a select committee.

We have had 25 hearings. We have written eight reports. We have gone around to the countries that are drug producers, and as the gentleman has pointed out, we have focused attention on this problem.

But I think the gentleman is wrong in asking the President to set up an ad hoc committee for these reasons: With all of the criticisms that we have had in this Congress legislating, and we might have even been more mean by saying on the eve of elections of 1986 and 1988, with the fact that everyone came together and put together the bills under the leadership of the minority leader and Speaker WRIGHT's leadership and before that majority leadership, the members of the Select Narcotics Committee because they are appointed because of their relative committee assignments did not bring anything special to the table because they were the select committee, but they brought it to the table because they were on the Judiciary Committee, they were on the Ways and Means Committee, the Education Committee, the Energy and Commerce Committee.

So it was really a congressional function that we serve that served well by filling in a gap.

Let me try to fill that gap in without being partisan. In all these 8 years where we did the best we could with a piece of legislation, we did not have the direction.

I say to the distinguished leader, I am hoping now that this Congress that was mandated to Bill Bennett, and we have reached out our hands as the President has reached out his hands to the Congress, to say, "Don't force the select committees and the standing committees to get together on this floor to attempt to respond to our foreign policy, to our law enforcement policy, to education and to rehabilitation."

Let the administration now come to us and tell us as a whole what legislation they need, what legislation they want.

Do we not know, I say to the leader, that it will be the standing committees that will now review what the administration is asking for and then perhaps if we find that we have developed a strategy, a policy, and the White House for the first time as the President addressed both the House and the Senate, is telling us what they want, it could very well be that we do not need an ad hoc group. All we need is an Executive with leadership and a House and a Senate that is willing to respond.

Madam Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly did not want in the course of my remarks to in any way disparage the good work that the gentleman and the members of that committee have done over a period of years. As a matter of fact, frankly, it is the only committee or entity in government itself that was highlighting the issue, as the gentleman was doing so well, and then we ultimately got to the point where we were attempting in our feeble nimble way to pull things together as best we could under the circumstances.

I guess what I am suggesting is that all serves a very useful role. Now maybe we ought to be giving consideration to what is the next step, what is the next mechanism by which we really do pull things together in a very well-coordinated way.

Admittedly, with a drug czar, he has a big job ahead of him.

Mr. RANGEL. Madam Speaker, I say to the distinguished leader, I think this. If we reconstitute the committee, let us not stop working together as we have in the past, Republicans and Democrats, to see if there is a better way to do it.

I am strongly suggesting that if indeed President Bush through the drug czar reevaluates the budget, the programs that are working, the programs that are not working, and comes to this Congress with specific directions and suggestions, it could very well be that a nonlegislative committee would have no function.

What we think we have tried to do is to guide the Congress in providing the legislative leadership so that the executive branch would at least have some program, even though I agree with the gentleman, no one could be particularly proud of the manner in which we have reached that.

I certainly hope that the Congress and this President can put our committee out of business.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to a distinguished member of the Rules Committee, the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Madam Speaker, I thank both gentlemen for their courtesy, the vice chairman of the subcommittee and also the chairman of the committee.

I think we are about to do something that certainly surprises me and may surprise some other people. I will do a brief introduction to this idea because I think you all have a right to know how it occurred.

Returning this morning flying in from my district, I was even more disturbed about the drug problem in this country and the need to combat it.

Yesterday I was at a large company that told me, for instance, that 30 percent of its potential new hires were testing positive for drugs. This is in the heart of America. This is not on the streets of Chicago, the barrios of Los Angeles. This is in what is supposed to be the heartland.

It is a scourge that affects every corner of this country, whether it is a big city or a small town. It has crept into our neighborhoods, our schools, and where we want people to work.

So what are we doing here today? We are asked to create a select committee to study the problem, but we all know we have gone beyond that.

We had a drug bill last year. It was patched together by umpteen committees, lots of task forces on both sides, and a good bill; but it took too long and it ended up really, if we are going to be objective, as a disjointed piece of legislation. We do not have a single committee to deal with this most important domestic problem facing the Nation.

So what I was going to do was something rather complicated. I was going to ask us to vote down the previous question. I know this is odd coming from a Republican. It was not going to be to get rid of select committees, as tempting on one count it would be for me. It was to form a single committee on drug abuse. The amendment would have added a new section to title III that would have directed the Rules Committee to report back as soon as possible its recommendation on changing the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control to a permanent committee, one with legislative jurisdiction. It would not affect the other select committees. They would all be established, but it would hold forth a real possibility that the Narcotics Committee would be given real teeth and real responsibilities in our war on drugs.

The amendment reads as follows:

AN AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. MARTIN OF ILLINOIS TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 84

In Title III, add the following new section:

"SEC. 307. The Committee on Rules shall report back to the House at the earliest practicable date its recommendations on reconstituting the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control as a permanent, standing committee of the House with legislative authority.".

It struck us on both sides of the aisle that there was some kind of irony that we gave the President the authority to create a single drug czar, but we did not give ourselves the same single focus, the same authority to oversee that czar and to move rapidly, if necessary, on any legislation.

Madam Speaker, make no mistake about it, it would have been an important vote, but it was not meant as some sneaky little vote and then we have a press release saying how wonderful I am and then have it go the way of all of those kinds of votes.

I have to go to the chairman of the committee and to the members on my side, and I would like to talk to the chairman right now and read the amendment that I wish that this House would have considered and to hear the chairman's reaction, "that the Committee on Rules shall report back to the House at the earliest practicable date its recommendation on reconstituting the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control as a permanent standing committee of the House with legislative authority."

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. MARTIN. Madam Speaker, I am happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Rules in the absence of the other members of the Committee on Rules would be reluctant to agree to any amendment here.

I would, therefore, ask the gentlewoman from Illinois, a distinguished member of the Committee on Rules, not to make a formal offer of an amendment, because as chairman of the Committee on Rules, here and now, I offer my firm assurance that the Committee on Rules will at an early date, with the cooperation of the gentlewoman from Illinois, have a hearing and make a decision on the matter that she proposes and report back to the House just as her proposed amendment would offer with respect to whether or not the Select Committee on Narcotics should be constituted as a standing legislative committee of the House.

Madam Speaker, I commend the gentlewoman for this proposal, because I am told that it has been said here on the floor that there are some 50 committees and subcommittees of the House that have jurisdiction in part over this matter of narcotics, and undoubtedly the proposal of the gentlewoman from Illinois which concentrates the authority in this select committee as a standing committee to deal properly with the subject.

I give the gentlewoman my assurance that the Committee on Rules will do what her amendment proposes.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Madam Speaker, there is no Member of this House who would not accept the word of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, although if you will forgive me for a moment, it is a little difficult for a Republican to figure out how to act when they have won, but I thank the chairman, and I look forward to working together, because it matters too much to all of us, and I am greateful to the chairman of the Committee on Rules. I accept his word as his bond.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for debate purposes only, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND].

Mr. LELAND. Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be here with my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. EMERSON, the vice chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger. He has been a leader in directing the committee toward the bipartisan goal of alleviating domestic and international hunger.

I am proud to say that more than 230 Members of Congress and a broad-based coalition of nearly 300 religious, community, charitable, medical, farm, and labor organizations are supporting reauthorization of the committee in the 101st Congress.

This continuing and increasing support for the committee is testimony to its accomplishments in investigating hunger, expanding understanding of its complexities, and developing practical policy options to end these conditions. Citizens at the grassroots clearly endorse a congressional entity to search out the causes of hunger and malnutrition in our country and in the world and to find remedies to end them. Marianne Leach of CARE and Rod Leonard of Community Nutrition Institute have worked unstintingly to assure that these many voices were heard on Capitol Hill.

During the 100th Congress the committee's work was extensive. Thirty-two hearings, nine basic human needs seminars and numerous briefings were held; nine reports were published and monthly status reports on international and domestic hunger were issued and widely distributed. This activity builds a framework for comprehension of hunger, the ancient scourge of humankind, in this time of apparent plenty. It enables Congress and the public to explore and develop appropriate policies to eliminate hunger.

The committee has gone beyond fulfilling its mandate to "conduct a continuing comprehensive study of the problems of * * * hunger." Through its investigation, study, and advocacy, it has played a role in saving millions of lives.

The committee was instrumental in setting up the Child Survival Fund and has worked to strengthen and sustain its activities in the U.S. Foreign Assistance Program. A direct result can be seen in the most recent UNICEF report which states that the lives of 1.5 million children are being saved each year in the developing world.

Committee attention to scientific findings on the impact of vitamin A on child mortality resulted in greatly expanded research and operational programs.

From the Ethiopian famine in 1984 to the current tragic situations in the Sudan, the committee has monitored hunger in Africa, and elsewhere in the world and has been instrumental in assuring that humanitarian relief was provided. Whether caused by natural disasters such as drought, deliberate destabilization by outside governments, or civil strife, the existence of hunger has been substantiated by the committee so that aid could move as swiftly as possible to those in need. The committee has coordinated with private voluntary and multilateral organizations in these efforts.

In 1988 a Committee Working Group on Latin America was set up to study human needs in that troubled region. This effort is already contributing to the well-being of needy people and has the potential for improving the possibilities for peace in our hemisphere.

A belief that the great productivity of American farmers must be effectively used to eliminate hunger has been an operating principle of the committee. Members took the lead in expanding the kinds and quantities of commodities made available to less developed countries. The committee also supported legislation to monetize food aid. An encouraging example of the value of this approach is the extensive national AIDS Program in Uganda, funded by local currency obtained from food aid sales.

The committee has worked from the premise that hungry people want to change their situation and have the capacity to do so. Through reports, hearings, and seminars, the concept of credit for small entrepreneurs in the Third World has become a substantial initiative and its applications in the United States are being studied.

In the same way, the committee took the lead in efforts to expand the role of women in development. The result was new legislation, the first in 15 years, that acknowledges the role women must play in economic growth.

Hungry people in the United States have been a separate and particular concern of the committee—the children in poverty, the homeless, the disabled, the African American, Hispanic and native American minorities who are marginalized in our society. Hunger has been examined in the Mississippi Delta, Appalachian hollows, barren Indian reservations, urban welfare hotels, and even affluent suburbia.

The committee has looked at the problem of inadequate benefits, the barriers to participation and the lack of access to competitively priced food that threaten the food security of millions of Americans, even in a time of economic plenty. The committee has brought innovations, such as the Farmers' Market Program for low-income neighborhoods, from the State level to the attention of Congress.

As the State and local governments, churches, social agencies, and other private organizations have moved to relieve hunger at the grassroots, the committee has supported them at the Federal level. The Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 included a provision to aid in the expansion of gleaning; amendments to the Tax Code initiated by the committee last year will make it easier for food producers and dealers to make tax deductible contributions to food banks.

There are those who say giving money directly to hungry people is preferable to supporting a committee. Such an action would alleviate hunger briefly but truly effective antihunger efforts require thoughtful long-term strategies. Committee activities have generated resources for hungry and marginalized people far in excess of committee costs.

The issues associated with hunger fall under the jurisdiction of eight standing committees including Agriculture, Appropriations, Banking, Education and Labor, Foreign Affairs, Government Operations, Interior and Insular Affairs, and Ways and Means. Through coordinated efforts such as joint hearings and member and staff consultation, the committee has worked effectively with these committees. The result has been both attention and action in many diverse areas.

The reestablishment of the Select Committee on Hunger in no way alters the mandate of any standing committee, nor does it lessen the role played by these committees in meeting their obligation to combat hunger. Rather, the select committee supports these committees by specific research and by providing a single focus on the commitment of this Congress and this country to eliminate hunger.

The stature of the United States as a world leader is based to a great extent on our generous response to people in need. This bipartisan tradition began after World War I when Herbert Hoover brought relief to our former enemies in war-ravaged Europe. It continued with the Marshall plan. The select committee follows in that tradition although the focus has broadened somewhat from emergency relief programs. Now innovative proposals that provide the maximum leverage in the battle against hunger are searched and studied.

There have been improvements in access to food and health care during the past decade but the grim specter of hunger still lingers in the world. It is estimated that more than 500,000 persons died of starvation in the Sudan in 1988. Every year 15 million lives are lost to malnutrition related illness. In the United States inadequately nourished children miss school too often or cannot pay attention to their studies. They are not acquiring the skills our society urgently needs. The nutritional status of the homeless is deplorable.

Despite progress, one in five children in Latin America is malnourished, one in three in Africa and Asia; 27,000 children die every day because they lack adequate nutrition and health care.

The moral requirements of justice, the human desire for peace and our own self-interest oblige us to maintain the effort to assure a decent diet to every person on this planet.

Through the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger this Congress will indicate to generous and concerned Americans and to the world community that our Nation is committed to wiping out hunger. It will send a message that the United States intends to maintain its leadership as a humanitarian nation. With these thoughts, I urge Members' favorable and continuing support for reauthorization.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished ranking member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. COUGHLIN. Madam Speaker, as ranking minority member designate of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I rise in strong support of the reconstitution and strengthening of the select committee. I would like to commend our distinguished chairman from New York, Mr. RANGEL, and our colleague, Mr. GILMAN, for the past accomplishments of the select committee under their tireless leadership.

The importance of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control is highlighted by the fact that our Nation's drug problem continues to be a crisis of major proportion that demands nothing less than our focused attention. We must continue and strengthen ongoing efforts to discourage the production of illicit drugs here and overseas; to interdict drugs destined for the United States; to intercept them at our borders; to apprehend, prosecute, and punish drug dealers, pushers, and users in the United States; to educate people about the dangers of drugs; and to provide treatment and rehabilitation for those affected by the scourge of drugs.

The select committee is particularly important because of its mandate to monitor this broad range of antidrug activities. Nearly every Federal agency plays a role in the war on drugs and it is the select committee's function to evaluate these efforts and to recommend improvements when necessary. It plays a vital oversight role in following-up on the implementation of the Omnibus Drug Acts of 1986 and 1988 to ensure that the intentions of Congress are carried out. In a very real sense, the select committee is the legislative branch counterpart to the drug czar created last year by Congress in the executive branch.

Our Nation has become increasingly aware of the seriousness of the drug problem as its insidious effects pervade every segment of our population. The problem is particularly acute in urban America where our children are literally dying in the streets because of drugs and drug-related violence. We need only look out the windows of our offices to see perhaps the most vivid—and the most shameful—example of the human toll the drug epidemic takes: Our Nation's capital has become America's murder capital. Why? Because of drugs and drug-related violence.

Madam Speaker, this is certainly not the time to falter in our war on drugs. I strongly urge my colleagues to support the reconstitution of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control so that it can continue to dedicate itself, full time, to helping ensure that this Nation has a comprehensive, coordinated, adequately funded Antidrug Program.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Madam Speaker, I rise today to urge each of my colleagues to support House Resolution 84 reauthorizing the House Select Committee on Hunger. Under the skilled leadership of Chairman LELAND, the select committee has dramatically focused the attention on a very real problem for many of our citizens—hunger.

During my first term in Congress, I have become well acquainted with the quality work that this select committee performs each day in the House of Representatives. Last year, I was fortunate enough to work alongside the select committee in a hearing conducted on a serious problem in Alabama—the nutrition of pregnant women and our shamefully high rate of infant mortality.

In my State, the rate of infant mortality has remained among the highest in the Nation for the past 5 years. This is not a fact to be proud of. However, finding answers for such a multifaceted problem as infant mortality is not easy. There is no doubt in my mind that developing better nutritional habits for both pregnant mothers and their infants will lower the risks associated with pregnancy. It seems to be common sense to me that we, in the Federal Government, should concentrate our Federal dollars on better nutritional planning for all members of our society, including mothers and children.

In the 100th Congress, this committee participated actively in the development of several important pieces of legislation. I am particularly proud of the work completed on the Women, Infants, and Children Program [WIC] in conjunction with the House Agriculture Committee. In a time of declining Federal dollars, the restructuring of WIC actually will spend our Federal dollars more wisely. I am confident that this expansion of WIC will provide needed assistance to many needy persons in Alabama. In addition, the select committee coordinated the effort to initiate the infant formula rebate program. This program reimburses mothers for money spent on specially formulated, nutritious milk products that are fed to young infants. A well-fed child is crucial in our battle against sudden sickness or even death that contributes to our Nation's infant mortality problem.

My colleagues, I would like to bring to your attention that I am not alone in my praise of the committee's work. Nearly 300 organizations including the U.S. Conference of Mayors, Children's Defense Fund, and the United Way of America have organized a coalition—the coalition for a select committee on hunger—to ask for your support.

I believe that the forthcoming work of the committee will continue to yield dramatic results for our Nation's hungry. After all, one needs only to walk two blocks from the Capitol, down Pennsylvania Avenue, to encounter persons asking for donations to feed themselves and their families. This is not a desirable condition for any person to be in. These persons are not asking for our pity. Instead they ask for our compassion and our dedication to finding a solution to a very difficult problem. In a nation of such incredible food production capabilities, we must strive to spread these resources more quickly and fairly among all of our citizens who experience hunger in this great Nation.

I hope each one of you will give serious consideration to supporting this reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York, Mr. BEN GILMAN, the former ranking member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. GILMAN. Madam Speaker, I also rise in support of House Resolution 84, legislation to reauthorize the Select Committee on Hunger.

I am proud to say that at least 300 organizations have expressed support for reauthorization of the committee.

It would be encouraging if I could state that since the establishment of the committee in 1984, hunger had decreased in the world.

Half the people of the world still go to bed hungry every night and millions of children die each year because their malnourished little bodies cannot fight infection and disease.

The causes of hunger are complex. Through more than 30 hearings and many significant reports our Hunger Committee has shown that a cluster of complex and interrelated problems are keeping the poor nations of the world in debt, destitution, poverty, and hunger. The myriad causes of hunger include environmental damage because of erosion and poor farming practices, deforestation, population pressures, waterborne disease, lack of credit that could enable the poorest of the poor to generate income for themselves.

Through coordinated efforts with committees of jurisdiction the Select Committee on Hunger has been faithful to its mandate to both study and review the problems of hunger and to make significant recommendations to alleviate it.

Hunger eats away at the solidarity of the human family and tests the depth and sincerity of the moral commitment of every nation and individual. If we truly believe that all members of the human family have a right to life and the means of providing for that life, we must, as a nation, demonstrate that belief.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my distinguished colleague and friend on the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WHEAT].

Mr. WHEAT. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84, the resolution providing for the reauthorization of the House Select Committees on Children, Youth, and Families, Hunger, and Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Madam Speaker, prior to coming to the House of Representatives, I served in the Missouri State Legislature. I began my service during a time of tremendous social change.

Developing legislation to adequately address problems arising from the various social changes was extremely difficult. One obstacle we in the State legislature frequently encountered was the absence of a central, official repository to provide us with up-to-date, accurate information on the status of matters relating to social problems like hunger, family changes, and illegal drug usage.

Today, due largely to the commitment and effort of individuals like Chairmen MILLER, RANGEL, and LELAND, the House of Representatives has three select committees which serve as this Nation's clearinghouse on these matters. Not only do the select committees serve as official repositories providing Members of this body and citizens of this Nation with conclusive information on matters relating to their respective jurisdictions, but the committees have also provided us with the foundation for critically needed legislation. For instance, the select committee on which I serve, Children, Youth, and Families, provided much of the information needed for legislation involving Medicaid expansion for pregnant women and infants, various child care proposals, and welfare reform.

Madam Speaker, the work of all three select committees being considered for reauthorization today should be applauded because much has been accomplished. However, a great deal of work still remains to be done.

Let us continue with the commendable progress made to date. We can do that by supporting this resolution reconstituting the Select Committees on Children, Youth, and Families, Hunger, and Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPTON].

Mr. UPTON. Madam Speaker, I rise to express my enthusiastic support of House Resolution 84, which reauthorizes the Select Committee on Hunger. I had the pleasure of serving on this committee last term, and I know first hand the valuable contribution it has made to advocate and coordinate legislative efforts to end hunger and poverty in America and abroad.

The Select Committee on Hunger has been instrumental in raising America's level of consciousness about the desperate nature of hunger and homelessness. During the 100th Congress, it examined a wide array of subjects relating to the problem of hunger, including homelessness in America, simplification and coordination of welfare programs, dwindling commodities in the TEFAP Program, the plight of the Afghanistan refugees, and the importance of women in Third World development.

Acknowledging the committee's work, the Alan Shawn Feinstein World Hunger Award for public service was presented to the Hunger Committee last April. This was a tremendous honor for each committee member. This award signified our commitment to addressing the long-term persistence of hunger by enhancing public awareness of issues affecting the less fortunate.

The Select Committee on Hunger is necessary because it is the only congressional forum which examines all hunger-related issues in a holistic manner. It is only too bad that on such an important issue committee and agency jurisdiction is splintered and authority over particular programs is jealously guarded. The hungry in America would be better served by fairer and more rational congressional committee and agency systems in which all hunger-related issues reside in one place. Until that occurs, the hungry in America and across the world need the Select Committee on Hunger.

I strongly support reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger and I urge my distinguished colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER], the very eminent chairman of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.

Mr. MILLER of California. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84 to reauthorize the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families. Congress exercised considerable foresight when it first created this committee.

Recognizing before many others that emerging social, demographic, and economic trends would affect the Nation's children and families in profound ways, Congress sought a mechanism to coordinate and review these changes, as well as recommend ways to improve public and private sector policies affecting this constituency.

At that time, Congress had little ability to step back from day-to-day legislative activities, to look across committee jurisdictions and across program lines and see the very real and deepening needs of a vulnerable but voiceless group: America's families and the children who live in them.

When the select committee began, there was little awareness in either the Congress or the public of the extent or nature of the issues affecting children, youth, and families. And few anticipated the far-reaching consequences of changes in public policy which have substantially deepened the vulnerability of millions of American families.

Now the need to address the Nation's investment in its current and future work force—the children and families of today and tomorrow—has reached the top of the public policy agenda. Given the heightened political attention which these issues are drawing on both sides of the aisle as well as in the administration, in Governors' offices and among corporate leaders, there can be little doubt that this select committee's role is now more timely and critical than ever.

To maintain our Nation's leadership and ability to compete in the international economic system and to ensure the survival of our democratic institutions requires a thriving, healthy, educated, and trained population ready and able to enter and remain in the labor market, to create and maintain families, and to participate in their communities.

Yet, without serious review and revision of current policies and practices in both the public and private sectors, America's children will not be prepared to shoulder the responsibilities of adulthood in the 21st century, nor participate in the technologically advanced labor force required for that new era.

The facts are alarming: Among today's youngest children, one in four is poor; more than one out of every five children lives in a single-parent family, and for black children, more than one out of two grows up in a single-parent family. Nearly 12 million children lack health insurance, even though many of their parents are in the work force. One in seven preschoolers is at risk of dropping out of school.

The test of whether a select committee should continue is whether the problems still exist that the select committee was designed to address, and whether the select committee in question has performed in a way which has aided Congress in its ability to respond to those problems. There is no question but that the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families meets these tests.

We have enjoyed an extremely productive and effective tenure.

In the course of conducting nearly 80 hearings and 20 site visits, and in drafting a score of major reports and studies, I believe we have responsibly carried out our mandate: We have vigorously attacked the most serious problems affecting America's families and America's children. In so doing we have helped pave the way to treating, and even more importantly, to preventing those problems before they become too serious.

In the last Congress alone we have taken on the problems of youth gangs, homeless families and children, the foster care crisis, family and child poverty, infants afflicted with AIDS, and the dual responsibilities of caring for children and the elderly, to name just the highlights.

Madam Speaker, the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families has taken on an institutional importance, both within and outside the Congress. We have become the repository for a broad and crosscutting segment of vital information with respect to America's families and children. We have become a clearinghouse for the media, for concerned parents, and for community organizations. These are roles we did not initially anticipate.

We have been called upon to help identify promising programs going on in local communities; where one can find a successful model in adoption or to prevent teen pregnancy. We have been asked to troubleshoot in a local community to identify the best infant mortality reduction strategy or the innovative family preservation effort which is keeping troubled families together.

Furthermore, as most Members of Congress have found out, we have become a clearinghouse for your staff.

We have achieved this by trying to anticipate where these issues are going 6 months from now, 1 year from now, 5 years from now.

We are proud that the select committee's early investigations and recommendations about the need for national child care policy have now found enormous public support, interest, and legislative leadership attention.

We are proud that calls for extending preventive care for young children are now being echoed by bipartisan choruses, from the Bush administration to the American agenda report by former Presidents Ford and Carter, and from distinguished corporate and university leaders such as the Council on Competitiveness and the Committee for Economic Development. For it was the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families that did the first work which identified and clearly documented that selected programs of prenatal care, immunization, basic nutrition, and preschool education saves lives and saves money. And we understood that all of this could be said, and had to be said, in one comprehensive statement.

We are proud that wide attention has focused on parental leave policies since our examination 3 and 4 years ago of the enormous stresses on American families, especially the families for whom balancing work and childrearing were creating emotional as well as economic strains.

In many communities, however, we now see problems that are far more complicated, deeply rooted, and destructive than they were just 6 years ago. Low-income families have become poorer; the dropout rate has not declined, children and families have become the fastest growing segment of the homeless population; and the crack cocaine crisis has fueled a frightening rise in urban youth violence. These are problems that will require comprehensive responses that are well coordinated with and attuned to the specific conditions of the neighborhoods and communities in which they have taken hold.

That is why today you will find us involved in communities and the people who live with them, so that there can be a thorough base of support. We are identifying ways so that a 5-year-old saying no to drugs will not be a lone voice, but that the 5-year-old will have a network of community support behind her/him. Today you will find us looking at the demographics of the year 2000—new immigrant populations and the widespread gap between rich and poor in this country. Today you will find us examining the violence which is tearing apart minority communities and strategies to stem that violence.

That is our charge.

We have also been called upon to bring people together when, for example, three communities are determining how to provide less costly and more humane services outside the hospital to babies abandoned by their families. We have been called upon to bring people together when health services and child care services and education and training services are all necessary for low-income families to avoid welfare dependency.

We have been able to mediate these situations both inside and outside of Congress. And, we have been able to do that because we have built a base in information and credibility.

And most recently we have been asked to collaborate with the Ways and Means Committee in their oversight of the foster care and child welfare systems. Last year alone, we held three joint hearings and anticipate further collaborative efforts this year.

So that while 4 to 6 years ago, I had a more limited view of the scope of this committee, our horizon has been considerably widened by the information pouring into us from our cities, our towns, our communities. We have not, as we have had before, the ability to ask questions and to delve into issues that standing committees cannot because they have legislation pending in their jurisdiction.

That we have been able to raise the visibility of many children and family issues to nationwide attention is a testament to the dedication of thousands of organizations representing parents, caregivers, teachers, and volunteers—and now corporate leaders and Governors—as much as to the hard work of the members of the committee. Again, I am gratified that 175 disparate groups, ranging from the PTA and the Association of Junior Leagues to the March of Dimes, from Gerber Products Co. to the National Child Abuse Coalition and the National Black Child Development Center, have come forward once again to endorse and support the reconstitution of the committee. I am attaching a complete list of those groups for today's RECORD.

We have shown we can make a timely, concrete and constructive contribution to improving public and private sector policies affecting America's children and families, and we ask your support for the opportunity to continue our efforts.

I urge your support for the reconstitution of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, and you vote for this resolution.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution, although I fully understand the sentiments of those Members who are skeptical of the need for select committees.

I agree with those of you who say the House already has too many committees and subcommittees. I would join you in streamlining our proceedings if it were also done in the context of broader reforms of the House committee system.

The fact of the matter, however, is that the legislative authority for issues affecting hunger is divided among half a dozen standing committees. We all know that when everybody has authority, nobody has responsibility. It is the unique responsibility of the Select Committee on Hunger to focus comprehensive attention on hunger and related issues.

I am the ranking minority member of the Agriculture Subcommittee with jurisdiction over food stamps and public nutrition. Hunger, however, is an issue that is also affected by Ways and Means Committee work on tax codes for charitable contributions, and Education and Labor Committee initiatives on school lunches, and Interior Committee programs concerning Indian reservations. As vice chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, I regard it as a very high priority to work closely with these other committees in coordinating the fight against hunger.

Madam Speaker, I join those who want to streamline the proceedings of the House and reform the rules of the House significantly, but I would urge them to consider the status of the select committees in the context of wider reforms in the committee structure of the House. We can and should do better, but let's look at the whole picture and not just a microscopic aspect of it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in support of these select committees. Surely we know children, elderly, narcotics control, hunger, these are priorities for our Nation.

Let me say a word about the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families upon which I serve. I want to say to the chairman who is here in this room, he has done an outstanding job. As a matter of fact, the work of that committee has been heralded by private groups and public groups alike. The studies that committee has produced have been quoted by our President, who talks about a kinder and a gentler Nation. So there is no question that we cannot turn our backs on hunger. We cannot turn our backs on children. We cannot turn our backs on the elderly or the problems of narcotics control, and therefore I strongly support this Committee on Rules' motion and intend to support it with all my heart.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my strong support of House Resolution 84, the resolution to reestablish the Select Committee on Hunger, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, and the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families. As a member who has been privileged to serve on the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, I would like specifically to speak on behalf of its continuation.

One of the most important resources of this country is our children. Sadly, the needs of this vital constituency, from education to housing to basic health care, were grossly neglected by the Reagan administration. Today, the United States has a higher percentage of children in poverty than Canada and most Western countries. Widespread family violence, increases in juvenile violence and drug abuse are some of the most obvious signs that many of our youth are in crisis.

Over the past 6 years, the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families in a bipartisan manner and under the inspired and inspiring leadership of its distinguished chairman, GEORGE MILLER, has played a significant role in examining the host of serious problems our children face. Its careful review of the status, needs and successes of the Nation's youth has served to increase accountability of and help shape intelligent policy for progams affecting children and their families. It is imperative that the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families be permitted to continue its important work.

Finally, I would like to include an article which appeared in today's Washington Post about a new report by the Center for National Policy, chaired by former Senator Edmund Muskie, called "Giving Children a Chance." This article summarizes some of the most severe problems facing children in America and makes policy recommendations to address them.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 28, 1989]

FIGHTING POVERTY AT A YOUNG AGE

(By Spencer Rich)

A fifth of the nation's children—the 13 million who live in poverty—are getting a raw deal from America, according to a book just published by the Center for National Policy, the liberal-leaning Democratic think tank headed by former senator Edmund S. Muskie (D-Maine).

The book, "Giving Children a Chance," seems designed as a blue-print for the efforts of congressional Democrats to beef up social program funding. The book's statistical portrait shows that low-income children receive poor health care, little educational stimulus and little contact with the mainstream world where they can pursue jobs and broaden their vision of life.

It's not only a cruel situation, the new volume argues, it's also foolish and self-defeating, because society needs healthy, educated, effective workers to advance the productivity of the nation and its competitive position in the world.

What these children need is what all children need, says the book, which was edited by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families.

Prenatal care for pregnant women, medical care and immunization for infants and special nutrition programs under the Women-Infant-Children (WIC) food program help avoid costly birth defects and infant diseases, says Miller.

Preschool education programs such as Head Start, he says, are crucial in providing the mental stimulation and early capacity to learn that enables children who don't get that stimulation at home to succeed in school later.

And many of these programs, he argues, are highly cost-effective.

"For every federal dollar invested in WIC, $3 is saved in avoided hospitalization costs. For every dollar invested in preschool education, $6 is saved in reduced crime, special education and welfare expenditures."

The biggest problem, according to the book, is that these programs are not adequately funded, even though they already cost billions: "Less than half the women eligible for WIC services receive them. Only 18 percent of the children eligible for Head Start are enrolled." And many families well below the poverty line are not eligible for Medicaid.

In the book, Sara Rosenbaum, of the Children's Defense Fund, writes, "Poor children are twice as likely as non-poor children to be born at low birthweight (less than 5.5 lbs.), a condition which increases by 20 times the likelihood of death during infancy.

"Low birthweight also increases the risk of lifelong disabilities such as cerebral palsy, retardation, blindness, or vision, learning and hearing impairments," say says. "Poor children are far more likely than nonpoor children to be limited in major life activities because of chronic illnesses and disabilities."

"Policymakers from both parties have become increasingly aware that if we are to forge a productive, economically secure future, we must invest now in developing the capacities of children who will run that future economy," the book argues.

The book, in effect, makes the classic Democratic argument for broad federal social program spending.

Many conservatives, without opposing health care and nutrition programs for children, believe that the captivity of low-income children in a growing underclass world will never be solved unless some fundamentals are addressed.

They cite, for example, the existence of a welfare system that has permitted women to receive assistance for years and have children without attempting to complete school, find a job, or become self-reliant.

Stuart Butler, director of domestic policy studies for the Heritage Foundation, said, "I am not as confident as Rep. Miller that we know what works. But we do know that the experience of the past 20 years in encouraging states, community organizations and families to seek the best way of dealing with problems—and getting welfare mothers into productive work that adds to the dignity of their lives and shows their children what is expected of them—are things we should not neglect."

Miller, who noted that Congress put a work component into the most recent welfare legislation, and his coauthors don't argue that the programs they espouse won't cost money. But they contend it's worth it—for a more harmonious society and fewer blighted lives.

Mr. GILMAN. Madam Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA].

Mrs. MORELLA. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the reauthorization of the three select committees being considered today. In particular, I want to take this opportunity to speak on behalf of the Select Committee on Hunger.

The issues relating to hunger in the United States and in the world are complex and numerous. Currently, at least eight standing House committees share jurisdiction over this issue. The Select Committee on Hunger has worked over the past 5 years to develop coordinated proposals to address world and domestic hunger, with an impressive list of accomplishments. The continued authorization of this selection committee is supported by a broad coalition of 300 organizations and groups, as well as 230 House cosponsors.

Some of the activities and proposals which the select committee has worked for, and developed to fight world hunger include: The Women in the Development Act, legislation to better integrate Third World women into development assistant programs; legislation to make U.S. AID funds available for loans to the very poorest of the world's poor; funding earmarked for aids education in the Third World; creation of the Child Survival Fund; the Vitamin A Deficiency Program; a focus on population programs, and the link between environmental decline and hunger in developing countries, and close monitoring of the African food emergencies.

In the area of domestic hunger, the select committee developed legislation to establish a 3-year, 10-State demonstration project to provide fresh fruits and vegetables to nutritionally at-risk women, infants and children. The committee worked to simplify food stamp and AFDC application procedures; it played an important role in obtaining changes in the Tax Code to increase the flow of donated food to food banks. The committee was responsible for increased funding for a 3-year extension of primary and mental health care services for the homeless which was included in the McKinney Act reauthorization.

These activities and proposals represent just a few of the efforts in which the select committee has played a key role during its existence. It is clear that the members and staff have been instrumental in developing a much more coordinated and effective congressional response to both domestic and world hunger problems. The chairman of the select committee, Mr. LELAND, and the ranking member, Mr. EMERSON, have provided exceptional leadership.

I urge my colleagues to join me in voting for the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger. The magnitude of this continuing crisis demands a concerted congressional effort, and the select committee has clearly made significant contributions to our work over the last 5 years.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ESPY].

Mr. ESPY. Madam Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding time to me, and I would like to use the time available to promote the reauthorization of all three select committees and to use the time I have available to speak to and particularly address the reestablishment of the Select Committee on Hunger.

Madam Speaker, in 1987, 15 out of every 1,000 babies born in my district, the Second Congressional District of Mississippi, died at birth or before their first birthday. In Mississippi, two in five children are born into families living below the poverty level; one in two black children are born into poverty. AFDC and food stamp benefits for a single mother of three children in Mississippi, which has the second lowest benefit in the Nation, amount to only 38 percent of the Federal poverty level.

These statistics alone demand that we reestablish the House Select Committee on Hunger which has investigated hunger and the problems resulting from poverty and neglect not only in Mississippi, not only throughout the United States, but indeed throughout the world since its inception during the 98th Congress.

The committee has supported and pushed important legislation aimed at helping families become healthy, self-supportive, and productive.

The committee has also conducted numerous field hearings and written insightful reports on problems, such as hunger and poverty in the Mississippi Delta and in Appalachia, the access and availability of credit to the poor in developing countries, and barriers to participation in Federal assistance programs, and examined the role of self-help programs in assisting poor people to improve their living standards and attain self-sufficiency. It has conducted hearings on the problems of delivering relief supplies in countries such as Ethiopia and Sudan. It has supported efforts to expand the number of Third World women reached by U.S. development programs and to establish a pilot program that would provide low-income mothers of infants and children with coupons to buy fresh produce at farmers' markets in this country.

This committee has pushed efforts to expand services to runaway and homeless youth, the most neglected and vulnerable groups in the growing homeless population.

As a member of the Select Committee on Hunger I would like to end, Madam Speaker, saying much has been accomplished. We have come a long way, but we have a long way to go. The members of this committee, who have traveled this country and the world, know this better than anyone. It is imperative that we reestablish this committee and continue our struggle to fight hunger, fight poverty, fight ignorance, and conquer them in our lifetime.

Mr. GILMAN. Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the ranking Republican on the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY].

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, on which I have served since its creation in 1983. Let me begin by commending our former colleague, Senator DAN COATS, for his leadership and outstanding efforts on behalf of families. He is a committed spokesman for the family and I know we all wish him well in continuing that role in the Senate.

This select committee was formed 6 years ago because of a concern by members, like myself, who believed that the needs of American families were not given sufficient consideration in policies and programs established by Congress. It is clear to me that many of the predicaments now faced by families, particularly the rise in the number of single-parent families and out-of-wedlock pregnancies, have been fostered, if not caused, by well-meaning, but failed, legislative efforts. These, in turn, can be seen as linked to such pervasive national ills as drug abuse, family violence, infant mortality, juvenile crime, illiteracy, et cetera.

So many aspects of family life are interrelated. Unfortunately, the crowded schedules of standing committees do not permit them to look with any depth into the condition of families, their problems or their strengths. Moreover, jurisdictional issues make it almost impossible to have an integrated approach to legislation affecting families. All too often measures are moved which address single facets, or symptoms, of broader problems. This has created, over the years, a patchwork of policies which leave many families out in the cold.

I believe one of the greatest contributions this committee can and has made is to highlight State and local initiatives, both public and private, which successfully provide assistance to families, clearly, the most effective are those which solicit the active participation of parents and children. Voluntarism is also a key. In my view, Congress should be the payer and participator of last resort.

In areas where there is a Federal role, or the Federal Government has an active interest, the select committee can contribute to the debate by examining the impact of legislation on families. I am hopeful that, in the next 2 years, we can look at several issues of interest and concern to Members of Congress and their constituents: Foster care and adoption, Medicaid and infant mortality, departmental obstacles to providing services to families, to name just a few.

Madam Speaker, I believe it is appropriate for Congress to have a body like the select committee undertaking a comprehensive investigation of family life in America. The problems need to be defined, the causes revealed, and solutions—both governmental and nongovernmental—developed. At all times, our goal must be to support families, not replace them.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. AKAKA.].

Mr. AKAKA. Madam Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Resolution 84. As a member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I lend my full support to the reestablishment of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control. Although Congress has made some headway in addressing our Nation's drug problem, the select committee still has much work to be done.

Congress worked diligently in addressing our Nation's drug problem with the passage of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 during the last days of the 100th Congress. After marathon negotiating sessions in conference, a compromise package was reported out with an authorization of $2.7 billion for fiscal year 1989. However, Congress still needs to appropriate an additional $1.786 billion for 1989 to fully fund the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988.

The select committee must continue its oversight role in the implementation of Public Law 100-690, as well as to serve as a resource for the House leadership, the standing committees of the House, and individual Members. Federal policies and programs to curtail the illicit production, manufacture, and traffic of narcotic and psychotropic drugs and to support drug abuse education, prevention, and treatment initiatives must be continually monitored and reviewed.

Of particular concern to me is that the Native Hawaiian Health Care provisions included in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act is fully funded. The bill authorizes $19.5 million over a period of 3 years to establish a series of nine Native Hawaiian Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Centers to serve the unique health needs of Native Hawaiians. The antidrug bill further provides that for the next three fiscal years, 1989-91, of the funds appropriated to the State of Hawaii under the alcohol, drug abuse, and mental health block grant, a figure equal to the proportion of native Hawaiians in the State shall be available only for native Hawaiians.

Also, it is my intent to see that the committee continues to followup on its investigation of marijuana cultivation in Hawaii. The fall congressional schedule prevented the committee from holding its planned hearing in Hawaii, and I hope that we will be able to reschedule the hearing in the near future. The Hawaii marijuana cultivation will remain an issue of concern to the committee on the 101st Congress; and I am anxious to set the record straight.

Prevention and education offer the best hope for a long-term solution to drug abuse, but it will take years for these efforts to yield results. In the meantime, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control must continue its unique role in addressing our Nation's drug problem. Until we can curb and eliminate drug abuse in our country, the function of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control remains critical.

Madam Speaker, I praise the outstanding leadership of the select committee chairman, Mr. RANGEL and the ranking member, Mr. GILMAN and look forward to serving with the chairman and our ranking member Mr. COUGHLIN in the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

I ask my colleagues to support the reconstitution of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROHRABACHER].

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Madam Speaker, I rise today in opposition to this resolution.

We are here at a time when we have an extremely high level of deficit spending. We all talk about the importance of bringing down that level of deficit spending. I made a personal commitment in my election to oppose anything that I felt was not absolutely necessary for the well-being of the United States and the security of the United States. I have to say to the Members, that after looking at this resolution and looking at what select committees do, I do not believe that these select committees are absolutely necessary to the well-being of the United States of America.

They have spent some money. They have over the last 5 years spent $9.3 million. They are going to cost us $2 million a year, and what do we have as an accomplishment of these committees?

From all the speeches we are hearing today, one would think that these select committees had solved the drug problem, one would think that these select committees had solved the problem of hunger, and one would think that gang violence was something of the past. The fact is that these select committees give Members of Congress the opportunity to talk a lot about problems, but they do not give Members of Congress the ability to act on any of these problems. The fact is that we do not need to give Members of Congress another platform to speak about problems. I think it is time for us to realize that although this resolution, as far as I can see, gives us a mandate to talk, it does not give us anything to do in terms of action, because these committees are meant, as has been told to us earlier, as a means of raising consciousness.

The best thing I have heard out of this debate today is a commitment to study the possibility of turning the Select Committee on Narcotics into a standing Committee on Narcotics. We need to talk more about what this Congress should do and not just about the problems of the United States.

Madam Speaker, the last point I would like to make is that a lot of times when Members are up here talking about the problems of the United States, whether we are talking about the problems of hunger or whether we are talking about the problems of narcotics, we give an impression to the people who are watching what is going on, on Capitol Hill through their televisions or wherever that we are doing something about it and not just spending time on a bunch of hot air. The fact of the matter is that the select committee system is designed to perpetuate hot air and not perpetuate action.

Madam Speaker, I believe these matters should be channeled into standing committees. I will oppose this resolution, especially on the Select Committees on Hunger and on Families, because I believe we should act on the problems of hunger and families, but I will support this resolution in terms of the Select Committee on Narcotics with the understanding that we are going to study the matter and move toward giving it full standing committee status.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Madam Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding time to me.

Madam Speaker, I stand in full support of House Resolution 23, reestablishing the Select Committees on Hunger, Children Youth, and Families, and Narcotics Abuse and Control.

As a Representative of the South Bronx of New York City, where drugs have had devastating effect, I would like to particularly voice my support for the Select Committee on Narcotics. Chaired by my good friend and colleague CHARLES RANGEL, the committee has been in the forefront of the ongoing battle by Congress to combat the drug epidemic in our Nation since its inception in 1976. The committee has continually served as a resource for standing committees and individual Members and their staffs through monthly newsletters, factsheets, and summaries in the development of anti-drug abuse policies and initiatives.

In addition to a source of information for so many here in the House of Representatives, the committee's contributions to anti-drug abuse legislation, particularly the Omnibus Drug Initiative Act of 1988. These contributions include the establishment of Intravenous Substance Abuse and AIDS Prevention Programs and the creation of a drug coordinator in the executive branch. The committee has also held numerous oversight and evaluation hearings that revealed shortcomings and inadequacies of programs established by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, acts that were subsequently addressed in the 1988 measure.

Our work is not done. There are still 30 million occasional users of cocaine and marijuana and there is still a drug industry that costs our Nation over $100 billion in increased health care fees, lost productivity and related crime and violence. In his inaugural address, President Bush proclaimed his concern about the Nations drug problem. We in Congress join him in his intolerance. We also need the skilled leadership from all parts of government and from all sectors of our society, including the leadership of the chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, CHARLES RANGEL. The work of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control has been invaluable and the participation of the committee must continue. I stand in support of House Resolution 23.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MFUME].

Mr. MFUME. Madam Speaker, I join my colleagues in support of House Resolution 84 to reestablish the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control in the 101st Congress.

Let me first say that I wholeheartedly commend Chairman RANGEL who has been very diligent in his efforts to remove the terrible and continuing drug crisis facing our Nation. The chairman's leadership has proven instrumental in putting forth bipartisan recommendations for constructive legislative initiatives.

Madam Speaker, drug abuse and trafficking have reached an alarming level in the United States despite the efforts of our law enforcement agencies. It seems that the more we increase our interdiction level and "zero tolerance" proposals, the more drugs are reaching our children in their schools and our neighborhoods. This is no longer someone else's problem, it has become everyone's problem and it will take a concerted effort to halt the flow of drugs.

In the 100th Congress, the Select Committee on Narcotics was instrumental in providing assistance in constructing drug education programs targeted at youth groups; creating new programs of block grants to States for reducing the transmission of AIDS by intravenous drug abusers; and working to provide greater funding for enforcement agencies both State and Federal.

Since the 94th Congress, we have made a commitment to the American people to provide a comprehensive and coordinated approach to drug abuse and trafficking issues. Just last Congress we reaffirmed that commitment with the passage of the Omnibus Drug Initiative Act of 1988. While the select committee has made significant contributions over the last 13 years by providing support to standing committees, it is clearly evident that we still have a great deal of work to do in keeping illicit drugs from crossing our borders.

Madam Speaker, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control has been extremely important in providing a vehicle to taking an in-depth view of issues involving complex and broad ranged public policy concerns, including law enforcement, health, education, international relations and criminal justice. We must allow the committee to continue its work and provide this legislative body with the expertise to examine the problems of drug abuse and trafficking.

I urge my colleagues to support the resolution now before us to reauthorization of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84, which establishes the Select Committee on Hunger in the 101st Congress.

I would like to take a few minutes to commend my good friend and colleague Chairman LELAND for his outstanding work and dynamic leadership on the select committee. I am fortunate to have had the opportunity to serve with Chairman LELAND on the committee during the 100th Congress.

Madam Speaker, since its creation in 1984, the Select Committee on Hunger has played a prominent role in conducting comprehensive studies and reviews of the problems with domestic and international hunger and malnutrition. Over the past 5 years, the committee has done an excellent job of providing a keen, informative examination of hunger that exists in our world. During the last Congress, the committee conducted 32 hearings, 9 basic human needs seminars, briefings, and visited numerous sites in the United States and abroad where poverty and hunger related problems persist.

In particular, the committee was instrumental in getting legislation passed which would increase the number of women in programs conducted by the U.S. Agency for International Development; reducing malnutrition caused by lack of vitamin A by getting the $8 million earmarked for AID's Vitamin A Deficiency Programs; and effectively brought attention and relief efforts in famine and disaster stricken areas in the international community.

Here in the United States, the committee has worked to increase the flow of foods donated to emergency food banks; secured provisions in the McKinney Act to provide Federal food assistance for the homeless; and made recommendations to assist native Americans and farmers.

Madam Speaker, as evidenced, the Select Committee on Hunger has been very active and provided invaluable services by working with several standing committees including the Agriculture, Banking, Education and Labor, and Foreign Affairs. And now at a time when hunger, famine, and natural disasters seem to dominate the news, the Select Committee on Hunger has never been needed more desperately. We must allow the committee to continue working to provide this body with the expertise and a wealth of knowledge to effectively respond to critical hunger-related issues.

The committee's work will be crucial in the 101st Congress as we face even greater challenges in our efforts to eradicate poverty and other hunger-related afflictions over the next couple of years. I urge my colleagues to support the pending resolution to reauthorize the Select Committee on Hunger.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BOXER). The gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. DURBIN. Madam Speaker, I am a member of the Select Committee on Children. It is my good fortune to serve not only on that committee, but also on the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Appropriations. There is no question but that I have drawn some good cards in assignments.

However, Madam Speaker, I will have to say that one of the more interesting and challenging assignments which I have been given is the Select Committee on Children despite the fact that it does not have any legislative authority. What this committee has done for this Member of Congress from Illinois is to consistently open my eyes to the problems that children across America continue to face.

In this land of bounty and goodness there are still many of the smallest and most helpless Americans who are victimized each day, unfortunately many times by those who call themselves friends or parents and unfortunately still by those who would cloak themselves as government agents.

Madam Speaker, I am glad that this committee exists. I salute my chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] for his fine leadership. Our former minority spokesman, DAN COATS, is now a Member of the U.S. Senate, and his able successor, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY] will surely carry on in the great tradition of this committee.

But I would commend to my colleagues these select committees, and I am sure, when it comes to the Select Committee on Hunger and the Select Committee on Narcotics, the same can be said. They are a consistent source of solid information, they challenge Members of Congress to look in areas we might otherwise have ignored, and they place before the American people some of the most important subjects on our agenda for us to consider.

Madam Speaker, we in this Congress will again address children's issues. The Select Committee on Children will help us to understand the import of these issues and the means we should follow to find a solution. I hope that this rule passes and that we do authorize and fully appropriate the necessary funds to keep these important committees in business working for the American people.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, initially I had risen at the outset of this debate to oppose the resolution in its present form, which was a resolution which combined these three select committees, and one of my primary concerns, as I stated, was the fact that we wanted the opportunity to debate with amendment particularly the Narcotics and Abuse Subcommittee, or rather Select Committee, and the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Rules, has given his word that he will hold hearings, that he will look into this issue with our full committee, and certainly that is good enough for me.

Madam Speaker, there is no one more respected in this entire House, ever served in this House, than the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and we certainly take him at his word, and I, therefore, certainly will not ask for a recorded vote on this resolution. I thank the chairman for his understanding in this matter.

Mr. FAZIO. Madam Speaker, I strongly support House Resolution 84, a resolution to reestablish this body's select committees, including the Select Committee on Hunger. As a member of the Select Committee on Hunger since its inception 6 years ago, I enthusiastically look forward to continued work on the committee.

The Select Committee on Hunger has had a positive impact in identifying and addressing the problems of hunger and homelessness in the United States and throughout the world. Its numerous hearings, reports, and other efforts have played a key role in developing proposals to address these important issues.

Unfortunately, the need for this select committee is as great as ever. Although we have made substantial inroads in addressing the problems associated with hunger and malnutrition, the select committee's mission continues to grow. But with the establishment of the Select Committee on Hunger, as these problems grow, so do our efforts in meeting the challenges.

Finally, I look forward to again working with the select committee's tireless chairman, Representative MICKEY LELAND as well as the International Task Force Chair, Representative TONY HALL; and the new Domestic Task Force Chair, Representative MIKE ESPY.

Mr. CONTE. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution to reconstitute the Select Committee on Hunger. Since its establishment, the select committee has brought painful and often tragic issues into our national debate. In doing so, it has served the Nation and the world.

The select committee has accomplished much, both at home and abroad. Its work is compassionate and effective. But hunger in any form has few easy solutions, and will not be defeated without consistent effort. If we hope in the future to prevent disasters like the famines in Ethiopia, Mozambique, and the Sudan, and to end the malnutrition and scarcity that shame our own country, we must recognize that the select committee's job is not over.

The victims of hunger are not powerful. They depend on others to be their advocates and to help them escape their pain. The select committee has been their advocate and if it has not found the solution, it has begun the search. It gives a chance for life to millions of people around the world. It gives the dream of a better future to families throughout America. I hope every one of my colleagues will join me in voting to reconstitute the Select Committee on Hunger.

Mr. GILMAN. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84, establishing the Select Committee on Hunger; the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families; and the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

With respect to the Narcotics Select Committee, it was created because the Congress thought it appropriate for there to be a single committee to address all aspects of the drug problem. Unlike the standing committees, which have fragmented, piecemeal jurisdiction over drug trafficking and drug abuse, the Narcotics Select Committee is the only committee in the Congress that is mandated to devote its entire efforts to monitoring and overseeing the complex issues pertaining to the illicit production, trafficking and consumption of drugs. The committee's resolution requires that certain standing committees be represented on the select committee. Thus our Narcotics Committee works closely with the standing committees regarding their legislative initiatives in this area.

As a senior member of the Narcotics Select Committee and of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I can assure my colleagues that there is perhaps even a greater need for a narcotics committee today than there was at its inception. This country is suffering from a drug epidemic. Our Nation is reeling under the impact of crack, a smokable, highly addictive form of cocaine, which has brought drug abuse and drug-related crime and violence to terrifying new levels. Our criminal justice system is overloaded by international drug criminals, and our drug treatment centers are swamped by more requests for help than they can possibly meet.

The Narcotics Committee played an important role in researching, developing, and enacting the Anti-Drug Abuse Acts of 1986 and 1988. The Narcotics Committee held extensive hearings on all aspects of the drug problem which were addressed by the omnibus drug laws, including provisions relating to drug abuse education, Federal assistance to State and local governments for narcotics law enforcement, interdiction, treatment and prevention programs, and on international narcotics control efforts.

In the last Congress we made some progress in addressing this problem. The 1988 Anti-Drug Abuse Act provides important new tools and new resources for the war against drugs. The Congress created the position of director of national drug control policy to formulate and implement a comprehensive, coordinated national drug strategy. The antidrug legislation included initiatives to combat money laundering, to end the use of American made chemicals in drug production, to escalate our efforts to eradicate and interdict drugs produced abroad, and to work harder at home in antidrug education and treatment and rehabilitation. But there is still much more to be done.

During the last Congress our select committee held 25 hearings, including oversight hearings to assess the implementation of programs established under the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986. If we are reconstituted, the committee intends to hold a series of oversight hearings on the recently passed 1988 Drug Act, as well as on the Federal drug strategy to be promulgated by the "drug czar."

Madam Speaker, narcotics trafficking and drug abuse have reached epidemic proportions, both here in the United States and overseas. In our Nation alone illicit drug dealing represents an estimated $140 billion a year untaxed activity. Our cities, towns, and school districts are hemorrhaging under the onslaught of drugs. The executive branch's antidrug activities, with 17 Departments and Agencies involved, has resulted in a fragmented effort. That is why Congress created a drug czar—to coordinate the entire Federal Antidrug Program. To prevent the Congress from being itself fragmented in the antidrug effort, the select narcotics committee was created.

No single standing committee has the time, resources, or expertise to monitor all aspects of the drug problem, but by working together the standing committees and the Narcotics Select Committee can effectively prod the executive branch in implementing our antidrug legislation and in developing a comprehensive, coordinated drug strategy.

Madam Speaker, as we know, the illicit production, trafficking, and consumption of drugs are diverse problems that require comprehensive full time attention. Accordingly, in an effort to provide that full time oversight of the drug problem, I ask that my colleagues vote in favor of House Resolution 84.

Mr. BEREUTER. Madam Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger for the next 2 years. There has never been more rapid technical progress against world hunger and nutritionally draining illnesses such as diarrhea than in the past 5 years since the Select Committee on Hunger was created. The rates of death and disabling illness due to hunger, malnutrition, and related causes like inadequate health knowledge, disease, and unsafe water supplies are falling at record speed in many parts of the world.

Yet UNICEF's recent report on the State of the World's Children reminds the world community, including those countries like the Soviet Union which have traditionally done almost nothing to support positive development in the Third World, that "some fourteen million children are still dying each year from common illnesses and undernutrition, most of which could be prevented by relatively simple, relatively low-cost methods." The next few years provide an historic opportunity to consolidate the gains of the last decade and spread them on a worldwide basis through the kind of practical leadership and good management that have always been the goal of U.S. programs in the areas of emergency relief and development assistance.

The work of the Select Committee on Hunger in recommending integrated and cost-effective solutions to international hunger problems has helped the American people become the opinion leaders of the world in the amazing progress against hunger and disease worldwide during the decade of the 1980s. The creation of AID's Child Survival Program and support for coordinated action in food aid and measures to improve the health, education, and productivity of the poorest people in the world are some of the initiatives the select committee has encouraged. UNICEF estimates programs put in place just since 1980 save the lives of an additional 2½ million children each year who would have died but for the programs like immunization, oral rehydration therapy, and growth monitoring that have been put in place through these initiatives.

This experience contributes to a growing consensus which is emerging among leaders of nations, private voluntary groups, and international organizations like UNICEF and the World Health Organization that there is a truly historic opportunity in the decade ahead to achieve a minimal level of nutrition and health for all the people in the world. The American people and the U.S. Congress have been the leaders in the fight against world hunger, and we should continue to lead. I urge my colleagues to support reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger so that the analysis and care required to promote the most cost-effective approaches to nutrition for all the world's people can continue be part of the work of this body.

Ms. PELOSI. Madam Speaker, I rise today in strong support of House Resolution 84, to reestablish the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, the Select Committee on Hunger, and the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.

It is essential for Congress to act on the problems these select committees focus on because it is unclear if the current administration will. These three select committees provide important information and resources to this body, and to this Nation. Problems like illegal narcotics traffic and abuse, hunger, and child welfare will not go away by themselves, Congress must continue its efforts to find effective solutions.

Representatives RANGEL, LELAND, and MILLER have provided outstanding leadership to their committees. The most difficult social problems confronting us today demand our constant and focused attention. I believe that it is important for Congress to demonstrate its continued concern for these serious problems.

Passage of House Resolution 84 will confirm our commitment to finding effective solutions to these significant social problems. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting House Resolution 84.

Mr. SCHAEFER. Madam Speaker, in 1984, in response to growing concern over hunger at home and abroad, the Select Committee on Hunger was established. It was charged with studying all hunger-related issues and recommending solutions.

Today, we are being asked to support House Resolution 84, which not only reauthorizes the Select Committee on Hunger but expands its membership from 25 to 30 members. As with many of my colleagues, I am greatly concerned with the hunger problem and believe that this committee should be reestablished.

As we have learned from the select committee's work, the hunger issue is complex and far-reaching. Often several House committees claim jurisdiction over complex issues. However, in some instances this can be counterproductive. In the case of hunger, where at least eight different standing committees have claimed partial jurisdiction, the issue becomes so fractured that little progress can be made toward developing solutions. I believe we need one committee whose sole job is to focus on the hunger problem.

An example of the good work the Select Committee on Hunger has done occurred last year when the committee played a key role in securing the adoption of a Senate amendment to the Technical Corrections Act. This amendment fought an IRS ruling which called for appraisers to conduct detailed appraisals of donated food. Had it been enacted, food banks could have lost up to 75 percent of their donations, severely depleting their food supply.

As in the past, the committee plans to address a number of issues during the 101st Congress. U.S. food assistance programs, corporate agribusiness, and U.S. trade relations with lesser-developed countries are just a few examples of the issues which are on the select committee's agenda this Congress.

In light of the serious nature of the hunger problem and the past success of the Select Committee on Hunger, I urge my colleagues to support House Resolution 84 with a yes vote.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Madam Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Resolution 84, which would reauthorize the Select Committee on Hunger for the 101st Congress.

I want first to commend the Committee Chairman, Mr. LELAND, and the Vice Chairman, Mr. EMERSON for their fine and diligent work in making this committee a bipartisan forum for addressing the heart-wrenching problem of hunger.

Since the creation of this committee, I have had the priviledge of serving as the first vice chairman and now continuing as a Member of the panel. I have come to appreciate the important role the committee plays in bringing to public attention the plight of the hungry. Clearly, we, as the richest member of the community of nations, have a political and moral responsibility to help alleviate the scourge of hunger across this land and around the world.

In this period of budget deficits and spending reductions, some may still question the need for this committee. I understand this concern. One of my top legislative priorities has been, and continues to be, deficit reduction. However, since the committee was formed, the problems of hunger and starvation have emerged as a global problem. As we have seen, solutions to the hunger problem cannot be developed in a single session of Congress. But, the toll which hunger takes both at home and abroad demands that we in the Congress must focus some effort solely on this problem.

The existence of the select committee offers specific tangible evidence that the Congress is most concerned and sees a need to go beyond the traditional boundaries of individual committee jurisdiction to involve itself in a comprehensive study of this devastating problem. This committee has served as the best vehicle for such congressional focus.

The causes of hunger are multidimensional—with economic, political, social and cultural roots. The alleviation of hunger defies easy solution. Some progress has been made but today's reality in areas like Africa, particularly in Ethiopia and the Sudan, clearly demonstrate that the solutions are elusive and, in some cases, seem unattainable.

In Africa, where the lives of tens of millions of people not only in Ethiopia and the Sudan, but in Uganda, Somalia and Mozambique, are being scarred by the tragedy of drought and famine, we can see first hand the interrelationship of the environment, the lack of technical knowledge, the dearth of natural resources, and the scourage of malnutrition and disease. As a member of the committee, I had the unparalleled opportunity to visit Ethiopia and experience this tragedy first-hand. The feeling of helplessness was overwhelming.

Equally astounding and troublesome is that there is still hunger here in the United States despite the abundance of natural resources and the availability of food. In addressing this issue of domestic hunger, our committee has attempted to assist those people in the United States who do not have adequate diets and need help in order to obtain a decent meal. In addition, the committee has addressed issues such as supplemental food programs for women and children, procedures for streamlining the Food Stamp and AFDC Programs and private sector contributions to emergency food banks.

Addressing a central issue, which I have called the "paradox of hunger" has been a key part of the committee's deliberations. The necessary technologies for food production and distribution are available, but are obviously underutilized. Clearly, more needs to be done.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I believe the Select Committee on Hunger plays a vital role as Congress' link to the issue of domestic and international hunger. The reauthorization of the committee would again signal our committment to try and help find solutions to this tragic situation. I urge my colleagues to support the select committee and this resolution.

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84 to establish the Select Committee on Hunger. During the 100th Congress, the committee performed a significant service to Congress. The committee's activities in the areas of domestic and international hunger and malnutrition have informed our actions to combat the national and international tragedy of hunger.

This past year, I had the opportunity to appear before the Hunger Committee during hearings on poverty and hunger in Hispanic America. The hearing highlighted the inadequacy of data for policy planning and investigated the merits of various options for improving the quality of national data on the health, nutrition, and income status of Hispanics. Without adequate data, both Congress and the executive branch, will be unable to effectively address the needs of the second largest and the fastest growing minority population in the United States.

In reviewing the four major health and nutrition data collection systems, the committee found that none currently provide for the sampling of a large enough Hispanic population to provide national data on this group. Insufficient funding for adequate sampling is also preventing the collection of significant health and nutrition data for Hispanics.

The committee identified the need for better collection of health data on Hispanic migrant farmworkers. Because of harsh working conditions and unstable living environments, this population group is more susceptible to illness. However, since migrants do not have permanent residences they are often overlooked when health data surveys are conducted.

The committee examination of data compiled on Hispanic participation in Federal food aid programs revealed that no mechanism exists for collecting and analyzing Hispanic participation in, or access to, various food and nutrition programs which have a significant impact on health status.

I look forward to the Hunger Committee's continuing efforts in this area and commend its chairman, my colleague from Texas, Mr. LELAND, for his leadership. I urge my colleagues to support the establishment of the Select Hunger Committee so that it can continue work that is essential for the country's welfare and for this Congress.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 84, a bill to establish in the 101st Congress, three select committees—the Select Committee on Hunger; the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families; and the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

In an environment marred by the tragedy of increasing national and international hunger, caused by complex issues and coming from a growing diversity of private and public sources, the work of the Select Committee on Hunger becomes more and more critical to any hope of effective and lasting solutions. The work of this committee in the last Congress, alone, attests to its invaluable service to all the committees of the House that must deal with some aspect of the crisis. Looking at the immediate and long-term problems of world hunger, we must continue the essential work of this special committee during the 101st Congress.

With equal intensity and with equal urgency, the work of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, has demonstrated its effective response to the problems that face American families, American children in the 1980's and 1990's, and American youth, today. With difficult and multiple sources and causes, with solutions as complex and diverse as the problems, this committee is critical to our work in the Congress. Again, a partnership for solutions is possible by the committees of the House through the oversight information provided by this dedicated and productive select committee.

It is the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control and its distinguished work that I urge continued support for. I have been a member of this committee for over 9 years and it has served with great distinction during a period of growth and escalation of one of the most devastating national and international scourges since the annihilation of complete worlds by the black plague. We are faced by a narcotics use and abuse that threatens total health systems around the world, a narcotics crisis that is dismantling the political and democratic structures of nations, and a narcotics crisis that is disabling whole economies and monetary systems.

It is the seductive lure of pleasurable escapism that seems to have seized whole cultures and societies with no attempts from the citizens of those societies to understand what their self-destructive value system is doing to the larger community of mankind.

With the passage of two omnibus anti-drug bills, one in 1986 and one 1988, with much of the thorough and complex preparation for these important pieces of legislation sourced in the work of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse, we all agree that the work of this valuable team of members and staff must be continued in the 101st Congress.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to vote for House Resolution 84—to vote for it—yes—but I also urge a vote in such overwhelming numbers to send a message to the Select Committees of their vital role in the task we face together in the 101st Congress on behalf of a suffering, endangered civilization of man.

Mr. SOLOMON. Madam Speaker, if there are no more speakers on this side of the aisle, I yield back the balance of our time.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I am pleased to reassert to our distinguished colleague on the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON], the same commitment I made on that matter to the able gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, in section 102(a)(1), the word "address" be corrected to read "addressed".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on title I, as modified, of the resolution.

Title I, as modified, of the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on title II of the resolution.

Title II of the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on title III of the resolution.

Title III of the resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PEPPER. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS A SPONSOR OF H.R. 84, VEAL CALF PROTECTION ACT

Mr. BENNETT. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. MACHTLEY] be removed as a sponsor of H.R. 84, the Veal Calf Protection Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BOXER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

PENALTIES FOR BANKING FRAUD NEED TO BE RAISED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, even though bank fraud has significantly contributed to the current savings and loan crisis, those that commit these crimes often get away with little or no prison sentences and hardly any financial losses.

In a recent report on the reasons for bank failures, the Office of the Comptroller General of the Currency states that "insider abuse and fraud were significant factors in the decline of more than one-third of the failed and problem banks that the OCC evaluated." And yet, people go unpunished.

Today, I am introducing a bill that would increase the maximum penalty for defrauding a financial institution from 5 years and $10,000 to 10 years and $1,000,000.

Under present laws, it is highly unlikely that if you mismanage a bank, you will go to jail or pay restitution. Stockholders pay for the directors' and officers' liability policies which in turn pay for the mismanagement liabilities. In 1987, there were 40 judgments in civil cases that returned $59 million to the FDIC. According to Mr. Irvine Sprague in an article in the American Banker, "the civil suits expose and disgrace those caught up in them, but often times they do not touch their [personal] pocketbooks."

One of the examples he cites involves the judgment against Seafirst's chairman and officers which exceeded $100 million—all of which was paid by the insurance carriers. The $88 million settlement against Continental Illinois' chairman and officers will also be paid solely by the insurance carriers.

Not only do people who defraud the banks not pay monetarily for their crimes, they also rarely go to jail. Often they stay out on appeal for years and then if they do end up in jail, they are released after serving only a fraction of their sentences. Jesse Barr, who was convicted of defrauding the Union Planters Bank of $17 million, was released after serving 11 months of his 5-year sentence only to commit fraud again a few years later.

Herman Beebe, Sr., built an empire worth about $150 million in the early 1980's. By 1986, his empire had collapsed; plus he had had a hand in ruining more than a dozen banks and savings and loans. In 1988, he pled guilty to two counts of fraud and is now washing laundry in a Texas Federal prison for a year and a day. Beebe had previously been convicted of defrauding the Small Business Administration for which he was sentenced to perform community service; some of his codefendants were acquitted. He was charged with fraud again in 1987, but that trial ended in a mistrial.

People who commit these white-collar crimes are rarely held accountable for their actions. Many do not learn that crime does not pay, but often they do learn just how profitable crime can be. Beebe's lawyer told Time magazine, "Herman felt he could make money, so he got in. He doesn't feel he did anything wrong."

The current penalties are too light. I hope by increasing the penalties and by having juries and judges use these penalties—we can get some of the buccaneers out of the business of white-collar bank robbery.

TRAGEDY IN SUDAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today's Washington Post reported that Sudanese Prime Minister Sadiq Mahdi has threatened to resign unless the armed forces allowed him to form a new government to work for peace in Sudan. Mahdi told the Sudanese parliament: "The objective is peace, and peace will be easier to achieve if we rally around it at home."

This is the latest in a series of events in Sudan where last year some 500,000, and perhaps as many as 1 million people, the equivalent of the entire population of Pittsburgh plus 75,000 more, died during 1988. These innocent people died as a result of famine fueled by civil war between the Moslem north and the mostly Christian or animist south.

In January, I traveled to northern and southern Sudan as well as Ethiopia in order to gain a full understanding of how famine conditions there were affecting that country. No Member of Congress had previously traveled to rebel-held territory in southern Sudan and I was the first Member of Congress to visit any part of Sudan in nearly 3 years.

In the camps I visited in northern and southern Sudan and on the Ethiopia-Sudan border, I found many of the same images that haunted millions of Americans during the Ethiopian famine in 1985.

The two differ, however. The tragedy in Sudan is caused by civil war and the opposing sides' use of food as a weapon. The Ethiopian famine was the result of natural phenomena.

Briefly, I would like to share with my colleagues some of what I witnessed during my trip.

SOUTHERN SUDAN

The situation in southern Sudan, an area held mostly by rebel troops of the Sudanese People's Liberation Army [SPLA], is potentially critical.

While it is clear there is a great need for food, medicine, and supplies in the south, few areas of this region have been accessed and detailed information about the extent of the need is not available.

Of the approximately 7,000,000 people who live in southern Sudan, an estimated 250,000 died in 1988. Many hundreds of thousands more were displaced.

I traveled with the Norwegian People's Aid [NPA] to Kapoeta in southern Sudan to observe relief operations there. There are an estimated 30,000 refugees in camps scattered around Kapoeta. These residents have come from miles around, many walking for weeks and even months to reach food and shelter. The NPA is providing food, medicine, and supplies.

Surprisingly, starvation and malnutrition were not widespread in the southern areas relief agencies have reached. I was told, however, that this was not an encouraging sign because it meant that most of the starving had either died or were attempting to reach feeding camps in the north or in western Ethiopia.

Most importantly, however, relief experts are concerned that 250,000 or more southerners—the entire population of Richmond, VA, plus many thousands more—could die in the next year if the rainy season arrives in April without adequate arrangements in place to provide food to the affected areas. Rain will make roads, already in poor condition, nearly impassable and will make dirt airstrips unusable. The weakened condition of those who survived the famine this year could exacerbate the tragedy next year.

ETHIOPIA

In Ethiopia I visited Fugnido camp, one of four refugee camps located near the Sudan border outside the town of Gambela. Hundreds of thousands of Sudanese have trekked from Sudan to these refugee camps in search of food and shelter and respite from the war. It is sadly ironic that the situation in Sudan is so desperate that people will flee to Ethiopia for relief.

The case of 9-year old Mayen-Mayen Diye was typical of those I encountered at Fugnido. Mayen and others in his village were attacked by a government armed militia in Aweil. His family had been killed. After the attack, he found himself with about 90 other young boys in the woods. Together with their cattle they walked for 5 months in search of food and shelter. Of the approximately 90 that began the journey, only about 25 survived it.

The trail that Mayen followed has become known as the trail of corpses because of the large number of Sudanese who died along that route seeking food and shelter. It is said that many refugees located the camps by following the trail of bones.

The camp I visited maintained a poorly equipped medical facility for the most seriously malnourished and operated a supplemental feeding program for those who were less seriously malnourished.

NORTHERN SUDAN

In northern Sudan, I viewed several camps in Kosti, a 4-hour drive from Khartoum, the capital of Sudan. In Kosti, there are an estimated 65,000 displaced persons, primarily women and children who have fled from the war areas of the south in search of food and shelter.

Combo camp, home to approximately 20,000 Sudanese, was typical of the camps I saw. On the day I visited, 32 new people had arrived from camps further south. One woman said she had walked for 5 days from a camp further south to reach Combo.

These camps, and others like them, have been established along the refugee route from the south to help take pressure off the already overcrowded camps in Khartoum. In all there are an estimated 228,500 displaced persons in northern regions outside Khartoum and this figure is expected to increase to 330,000 by 1990.

In and around Khartoum there are an estimated 1,000,000 displaced persons. This figure is expected to reach 1.25 million by 1990. As with the camps in Kosti, living conditions are very poor and disease is prevalent. One camp was actually built on top of a city dump. Water is in short supply and housing is cramped and in poor condition.

One AID official told me privately that while there is food reaching the camps, malnutrition levels may still be as high as 25 to 30 percent because of logistical difficulties in feeding 1 million people every day. This problem will only increase as the number of refugees increase. The results could be even more tragic, however, if food shortages develop.

I have brought several pictures along which I took during my trip. These pictures tell the story more clearly than can words.

Upon my return from Sudan, I briefed Secretary of State James Baker. Secretary Baker, who had just been sworn into office 2 days before I met with him, was well versed about the political and relief situation in Sudan.

The Bush administration and Secretary Baker have shown a deep sensitivity to the problems in Sudan.

After our meeting, Secretary Baker quickly dealt with the problem by issuing a strong statement calling on the government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army to ensure that food reaches people in all parts of Sudan. The statement also called for an early cease-fire to promote peace and allow relief to reach those in need.

Secretary Baker's statement is brief, and I want to share it with my colleagues:

STATEMENT OF JAMES A. BAKER III

The U.S. Government remains profoundly concerned about massive human suffering in Sudan. The cause is the civil war, now in its sixth year. Most of the war's victims are civilians who are displaced and impoverished or who starve to death for lack of delivery of available food. The death toll from starvation in 1988 alone is estimated to range in the hundreds of thousands.

Many Sudanese and expatriates are laboring tirelessly to ensure food deliveries, and the cooperation with these efforts by both the Sudanese Government and the Sudanese Peoples' Liberation Army [SPLA] has improved in recent months. But much more needs to be done. We call on authorities at all levels on both sides to remove remaining obstacles and do everything possible to provide emergency relief to victims caught in garrison towns and other areas of the war zone. Failure to do so will mean that thousands more will die in the coming rainy season. The United States will do all it can to support this effort. We call on other donors also to undertake or expand relief efforts.

The sad reality, however, is that starvation will almost certainly not end until the fighting ends. As friends of Sudan we urge the Sudanese Government and the SPLA to put peace first and to agree to an early cease-fire which would promote that goal and allow relief to reach those in need.

In recent weeks the United States has also provided food and supplies for cross-border operations into southern Sudan. This is the first direct United States assistance for the people in southern Sudan and is an important first step. United States AID officials are also working with other relief agencies for further operations into southern Sudan.

In response to the administration's actions the Sudanese Embassy announced recently that some 2,800 tons of relief material have been delivered to towns in southern Sudan since January and 61 barges loaded with relief supplies are enroute to Malakal, an area deeply affected by the famine.

Since the Bush administration has acted, the Sudanese Government has indicated a willingness to seek peace. Today's Washington Post story about Prime Minister Sadiq Mahdi's call for peace in Sudan is the latest response to the efforts of Secretary Baker and the Bush administration.

These are very positive steps which have undoubtedly helped to relieve the suffering of thousands of Sudanese and will undoubtedly save the lives of many thousand more in the coming year.

I believe the Bush administration has a unique opportunity to influence the peace process in Sudan. Peace is the one missing link that will eliminate the crisis in Sudan that threatens so many thousand people.

With all of the positive steps that have been taken thus far, a cease-fire agreement which opens the roads and allows the free passage of food in both northern and southern Sudan could be the step that ensures there is little or no famine in Sudan in 1989. Hundreds of thousands of lives could be saved.

I have recommended to the administration that the United States appoint an individual with a thorough understanding of Africa and its politics—a peace envoy of sorts—to negotiate between both sides of the Sudanese conflict in order to achieve a cease fire and open roads policy that will allow food, medicine, and supplies to reach all parts of Sudan.

Such an appointment will send a powerful message to the world and the people of Sudan that the United States is committed to preventing a humanitarian disaster of the type that occurred in Sudan last year. More importantly, it would provide the framework for the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army to begin to iron out their differences. This could only lead to improved conditions for all people in Sudan.

I sensed during my visit that the people of Sudan, from both the north and the south, are tired of the fighting. They are beginning to recognize that the war, which costs the Government of Sudan about $1 million a day, is the cause of many of that nation's problems.

I have also recommended that the U.S. Government ask the Soviet Union to urge the SPLA to reach a cease-fire agreement with the Government of Sudan. The Soviet Union has a close relationship with Ethiopia and Ethiopia serves as a base for SPLA activities. Soviet influence on the SPLA combined with constructive United States intervention in the form of a peace negotiator could have dramatic benefits in reaching a cease-fire accord in time to avoid the tragedy that will come with the rainy season in April.

In summary, I believe the Bush administration has responded quickly, forcefully, and effectively to the problems in Sudan. The administration's efforts so far have undoubtedly saved many lives. The key, however, to a long-term solution is peace.

Before I end Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the State Department and United States AID personnel in Sudan, Ethiopia, and Kenya who helped to make my trip as useful and informative as it was.

In Sudan, Ambassador Norman Anderson and his wife were most hospitable. Embassy staff in Sudan, who work under very trying conditions, were especially helpful and informative. Paul Siekert, Pete Strong, Dane Smith, Peter Ford, John Koehring, and Joe Gregoire were among those who I had the opportunity to talk with during my stop in Sudan.

Chargé Robert Houdek in Ethiopia and his deputy Robert Frasure were extremely helpful to me in Ethiopia.

And in Kenya, Ambassador Elinor Constable and her deputy George Griffen, as well as Monica Sinding, Judy Johnson, and David Rhode all were very informative.

Often it is easy to forget the many dedicated Federal employees our Nation has representing the United States overseas. The mission that these employees perform is as important as any in the Federal Government and I salute their hard work, dedication, and commitment. Everyone I had the opportunity to talk with was a true professional and a credit to the United States.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to commend the gentleman in the well both for taking this special order today and also for the undertaking of his personal visit to the region of the Horn and specifically to the Sudan. I share entirely the analysis the gentleman has just offered.

This Thursday my Subcommittee on Africa, as the gentleman knows, will be holding a hearing on the subject of the Sudan. I look forward to receiving the testimony of the gentleman in the well at that time.

There are really two points that need to be stressed. One is the enormous magnitude of the tragedy that is unfolding and the lack of visibility. I do not think that there is any major tragedy of this dimension that has received so little visibility and about which the American and the international community are so unaware as the Sudan. There are literally millions of people at the risk of starvation if means cannot be found to both transport food into the impacted areas and also, as the gentleman said in his second point, secure a lasting peace. That is the second point, that our Government can and must do much more to help in facilitating a negotiated solution to the conflict within the Sudan.

I join in the gentleman's commendation of the Secretary of State, Mr. Baker, who made a very important statement. Really his first pronouncement on African policy was to put his personal imprint on sounding the note of urgency and concern that should have been sounded long ago by this Government of ours.

So I thank the gentleman and hope that Members will read closely the remarks he has offered today and that we will be able, working with the administration, to heighten our focus on the tragedy that is unfolding in the Sudan and find our way through to a constructive, humane solution.

Mr. WOLF. I want to thank the gentleman from Michigan for his comments and commend him also, as well as Senator SIMON. Senator SIMON and the gentleman have scheduled early hearings, which I think has been a very major step in helping people to kind of heighten their sensitivity with regard to this problem. I know the gentleman was planning on going to Sudan but for illness that he had, and I think the fact that he is holding the hearing on Thursday, and the fact that Senator SIMON did last week, has really helped move this process along. I would almost say that perhaps holding the hearings equals saving lives, because I think at the gentleman's hearings there will be greater attention.

I also want to commend the gentleman's staff, the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee, and also the staff of the Select Committee on Hunger. I had wanted to be over here doing the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger, but we had a delegation meeting. I just would like to commend Jeff Clark and the others because they really made a difference, the gentleman's staff and the select committee staff which helped bring a sensitivity, and frankly they helped me in my efforts to sort of move along.

So the gentleman from Michigan should be commended, his staff should be commended, and also the Select Committee on Hunger and their staff.

I think holding the hearings really is going to make a big difference.

Mr. WOLPE. If the gentleman will yield one more moment, again I want to thank him for his very, very kind remarks. It is the kind of personal visitation that the gentleman in the well has undertaken that really yields enormous new insight, and I hope other Members might avail themselves of the possibility of visiting the region directly.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

MOST-FAVORED-NATION TREATMENT FOR THE SOVIET UNION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VISCLOSKY). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to my colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from North Carolina, for allowing me to proceed at this point.

Mr. Speaker, my hopes soared for a minute when we were in receipt of a message from the President, because I thought it might be the parts of the budget that have been missing from the President, and he was going to tell us what he really wanted to cut. But apparently I am not to be made happy today.

Mr. Speaker, what I want to discuss here is the question of a possible waiver of the Jackson-Vanik law dealing with whether or not the Soviet Union gets most-favored-nation treatment. As Members are aware, Mr. Speaker, in the 1970's Congress passed a law which said that the Soviet Union could not get such status dealing with the right to send trade here at low tariffs until and unless they removed their obstacles to emigration from the Soviet Union, particularly of the religious minorities who have been the subject of persecution and wanted to emigrate.

There has been improvement in the behavior of the Soviet Union, both with regard to internal practices and with regard to emigration, and some people have argued that the improvement has been such that we ought to run now a test by the waiver of the Jackson-Vanik law which is allowed under the law by the President.

I think the answer is that it is too early. I hope that 4, 5, 6 months from now I will have a different view.

People have argued there are improvements in the way the Soviet Union has dealt with this issue, and they are correct. People have also argued that it is important to show the Soviet Union some recognition by us of the improvement.

My answer to that is that we have already done so. In January, Ronald Reagan, former denouncer of the Evil Empire, decided that Moscow was an appropriate place to have a conference on human rights, and he agreed to have the human rights conference in Moscow in 1991. People will be of differing opinions as to whether or not that was the correct decision, but it was made. I hope we will carefully monitor the promises the Russians have made with regard to that, and that we will exercise our right to oppose holding that conference if the Soviets do not continue progress, because the fact is they are progressing, but they have a very long way to go. They are still not nearly where a civilized society that respects human rights ought to be.

It is important to both recognize that progress has been made, but not to overly romanticize the situation where they are, and not lose sight of the fact that by far the greatest amount of progress yet has to be made if they are fully to deserve a title of a country that respects human rights.

But at any rate, given that they have been granted the right to hold that Moscow conference, which was of great importance to them, the argument that some showing to encourage them was necessary has been met. And the question now is do they meet the terms of Jackson-Vanik, and the answer I think is clearly not yet.

There are several thousand long-term refuseniks of Jewish background who have been asking for the right to leave the Soviet Union and who have been denied, and who have lived lives of misery and degradation and deprivation because of that denial in many, many cases based on wholly spurious national security grounds that these people were exposed to secrets many, many years ago which are no longer of any relevance, if they ever were. There is still not enough of an outflow. Yes, there has been progress. No, the Soviet Union is not yet at the point that it ought to be in its own interest as well as the interests of its people.

I believe that it is in our interest to encourage the trends toward recognition of human rights that have emerged in the last years of Mr. Gorbachev's regime. But it serves no valid purpose overly to romanticize what has happened. The decision to give the Moscow conference, which Ronald Reagan made, is now a fact. It is important that we monitor that progress.

On the other hand, we should also make clear that having granted that, we want to see more progress before we take the next step.

Mr. Speaker, in this regard I think that the statements that have recently been issued by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and the Union Council for Soviet Jews, the two major national organizations concerned with that, accurately express what American policy ought to be. I include those with my remarks today.

I hope that 6 months from now if the Soviet Union takes care of the long-term refuseniks and increases the numbers, if they continue to move in the direction they are moving in, we can come back here with a national consensus that a waiver of Jackson-Vanik will then be appropriate.

The statements referred to follow:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOVIET JEWRY

SOVIET JEWRY AND THE TRADE COMPONENT

History of the Jackson-Vanik amendment

Section 402 to the Trade Act of 1974, known as the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, was first proposed by Senator Henry M. Jackson in response to an exorbitant education tax established by the USSR to halt, primarily, the emigration of Jews from that country. It was later co-sponsored by Representative Charles Vanik. After passage by an overwhelming majority of both houses of the Congress, it was signed into law by President Gerald Ford January 3, 1975 as the Freedom of Emigration Amendment to the Trade Reform Act.

The law applies to all communist countries ("non-market" economies), and provides that MFN ("Most-Favored-Nation" tariff status), and US government credits and guarantees, will be withheld from any "non-market" country, until the President determines that the country nether denies its citizens the right or opportunity to emigrate, nor imposes an excessive exit tax to limit (or exploit) emigration. (In East Europe, Hungary, Poland, Romania and Yugoslavia have been granted MFN status, at various times.)

Following extensive negotiations, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Senator Jackson exchanged letters on October 18, 1974, outlining assurances on specific liberalized emigration practices, which Kissinger stated he had received from the Soviets. Partially due to these assurances, the amendment was altered to allow an eighteen-month waiver, renewable annually, provided that the President:

(a) certifies to Congress that granting the waiver will promote the objective of free emigration, and

(b) that he has received assurances from the country receiving the waiver that its emigration practices will be substantially liberalized.

A separate amendment to the Export-Import Bank bill introduced by Senator Adlai Stevenson III in December 1974, set a $300 million ceiling on US backed credits to the USSR, over a four-year period. While not part of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, and not necessarily in accord with the sponsors' goals, it was interpreted by the Administration, and later by Soviet officials, as being tied together.

NCSJ position

The Jewish community view is that many aspects of a US-USSR relationship hold a potential for Jewish emigration activists. Trade links between the two countries, among other bilateral ties, offer special hope to those struggling to be repatriated to Israel, and to rejoin their families. The prevalent view is that future efforts to enlarge trading activity between the US and the Soviet Union should reflect an understanding of the reciprocal obligations involved, including the protection of human rights.

The basic objective of the amendment, as a tangible legislative expression of support for human rights, still has widespread support as long as the USSR desires US credits to purchase American technology, or seeks to expand exports to this country.

According to the original sponsors, and their supporters, the Jackson-Vanik Amendment was not meant to block trade with any country, but to give it a "human dimension." Later, Senator Jackson was to explain that the amendment was "not locked in concrete," since it was designed to facilitate emigration.

The current view is that a sustained and significant increase in emigration, with the positive resolution of the cases of long-term refuseniks, would provide an opportunity for the President to make the required report on emigration to Congress, enabling him to waive the restrictions of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment for the initial eighteen-month period. At the end of that time there would be an assessment to determine continued compliance and eligibility for further annual extensions.

STATEMENT OF THE UNION OF COUNCILS FOR SOVIET JEWS

THE JACKSON-VANIK AND STEVENSON AMENDMENTS: MEASURED RESPONSES IN AN UNSTABLE ENVIRONMENT

1988 witnessed significant progress for Jews in the Soviet Union. And yet, though 19,393 Jews emigrated in 1988, permission to emigrate is still meted out arbitrarily by Soviet officials. Requirements which permit applicants' relatives to veto their application have not yet been removed. No published time limit for those said to have access to state secrets has been established. Invitations are commonly not delivered. The "first-degree" relative limitation remains codified and enforced against Soviet Jews who want to reunite with their families in the United States.

A foundering economy and the recent repression of Armenian activists reflect the instability and unpredictability of the current situation. Only by institutionalizing into law the emigration and human rights reform he has promised (and again postponed this week) can President Gorbachev begin to earn the credibility he seeks.

Soviet emigration performance must be monitored and verified to assure compliance with promises, and gradual achievements must be recognized by graduated concessions. The agreement to a Moscow Human Rights Conference was a first and substantial concession—a concession that was predicated, in part, on President Gorbachev's assurances at the United Nations to reform the emigration laws. Should the emigration trend continue to 30-35,000 in 1989, the evacuation of all outstanding Refusenik cases be completed, and the reforming legislation actually be enacted and implemented in accordance with the Helsinki Final Act and the Vienna Concluding Document, the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews would then support steps to repeal the Stevenson Amendment.

It is, however, morally and strategically imperative to withhold, at this time, any action concerning the most valuable concession, the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, until annual emigration reaches 50-60,000, the accepted benchmark since 1974. Jackson-Vanik is the statutory centerpiece of the emigration movement because it explicitly links Most Favored Nation status exclusively to a Soviet achievement of "high and sustained" emigration.

No single factor deserves full credit for high emigration figures. But the history of the emigration movement confirms that the Jackson-Vanik Amendment has been most effective in periods, such as the peak years for emigration in the late 1970's and the present one—when US-USSR relations are warmer, when the Soviet leadership seeks the benefits of either arms reductions, improved trade relations, or both, and when the United States makes it clear that it expects improvement.

This benchmark emigration level is far more than a "price" for an annual waiver of Jackson-Vanik: it is an instrument to measure and verify institutional reform in Soviet emigration policy. Once enacted, and if consistent with international guarantees, high levels will follow.

It must be recognized that because of dangers resulting from popular anti-Semitism which is tolerated by the authorities, and current practices which permit Jews to apply with minimal fears of reprisal, hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews are seeking to leave today. If the Soviets do indeed open wider the doors for emigration, then the standard we advocate should present no economic barriers that would justify retreating from the Jackson-Vanik "Freedom of Emigration" law.

Only by monitoring and verifying compliance with international human rights agreements, and by responding with a measurable quid pro quo, will the Soviets continue to increase their levels of emigration to the requisite rate. Even a one-year waiver of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment cannot be granted until the Soviets reform their emigration policy, and a high and sustained level of emigration is sustained.

(The Union of Councils for Soviet Jews (UCSJ) is the largest independent grassroots human rights organization in the world dedicated exclusively to gaining freedom of emigration and cultural rights for Soviet Jews. Headquartered in Washington, D.C., the UCSJ has 50 local councils and 100,000 members throughout the United States, with international affiliates in Canada, France, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union.)

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VISCLOSKY). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker today's special order is in honor of a month when our Nation officially celebrates and recognizes the extraordinary contributions of black Americans to the rich heritage and development of this great Nation. As you know, throughout the month of February Americans have been honoring the achievements of black Americans.

This year's national theme for Black History Month is dedicated to the spirit of an institution that is the nucleus of the black American community. "The role of Afro-American churches in economic, political, and social development at home and abroad" is both a fitting and proper theme to commemorate the unique role that the black church plays in the black community. It is a forum for activism and empowerment of all fronts and a successful breeding ground for outstanding black leaders.

One interesting phenomena is how leadership of our people evolved. Today we are very fortunate to have leaders throughout every profession and facet of American life, but long before the evolution of leaders in all other areas of American life, it was the black minister who not only led his congregation but gave leadership in the entire community.

His leadership was crucial to the survival of our people as we fought to break down the barriers of race, hatred and prejudice, and bigotry which prevented our young black men and women from acquiring the education which would enable them to become leaders in all areas of American life. And so the black minister had a dual role in our community. He had to provide leadership until we could develop other leaders and he had to find the means to keep open the doors of the church so that an oppressed people had a place to come together, not only to worship and pray, but to plan and pray—to plot and pray. The church was a sanctuary where not only we came together to hear God's word, but we came together to hear how we were coming on freedom's trail.

Sidney Ahlstrom in the book entitled, "A Religious History of the American People," writes on the role of the black churches. In his book he says, "From the days of emancipation until the mid-20th century, the church was by far the most important black institution after the family." It is also Ahlstrom who writes that black churches also gave the first impetus to economic cooperation, published the most influential periodicals and aided education as actively as any other institution. And then he says, "Finally, the churches were a badly needed refuge in a hostile world."

This writer I want to quote more extensively because more than any author whose works I have read, he seems to have grasped the historical perspective which I want you to perceive. He goes on to say that:

There is more pathos than humor in the reply of a rural Alabama negro who was asked to identify the people in the adjoining community: "The nationalty in there is Methodist" The church was, in a sense, a surrogate for nationality, answering to diverse social needs and providing an arena for the exercise of leadership. Far more than for whites, the black church served other than strictly religious needs.

The author then tells us that after 1877, as Jim Crow Laws, intimidation and political suppression steadily intensified, this function of the church increased in significance. More than ever it became a vital means of perserving a sense of racial solidarity. He tells us further that:

Virtually every major authority, whether black or white, seems to agree that despite poverty and poignant limitations, the local church was for good or ill, the primary element of the American negro's nineteenth century heritage.

It is in this context then that we look at the role of the black minister who provided the leadership in the development of that heritage. We must remember now that until World War I, nearly 90 percent of black people in America lived in the South and two-thirds of them were rural. So regardless of denomination, each of these little congregations were led by very modestly educated men. In most cases they had no more than elementary schooling. Yet as ministers, they were members of the only profession open to what were then called negroes. That is, they were in charge of black people's only free institution. In fact, today the black church remains the only institution in the black community totally owned by black people. Therein they were very important men.

James Weldon Johnson in his writings, in describing black ministers, calls them "the greatest single influence among the colored people of the United States." In the book entitled, "The Souls of Black Folk," written by our first Ph.D, W.E.B. DuBois, he stresses the importance of black ministers:

The preacher is the most unique personality developed by the negro on American soil. A leader, a politician, a 'boss,' an intriguer, an idealist—all of these he is * * *

And behind the pastor and behind the church has been a dedicated and committed people. Probably no people in the history of the world have been as oppressed, or enslaved, or so discriminated against. And yet, they have survived with an unfalterable faith in their God. And along with their faith in God, they have had faith that one day this Nation would rise up and live up to its creed—that all men are created equal. Throughout it all, we have never doubted that one day we shall overcome, and that this Nation will come to know the true meaning of its own pledge of allegiance of one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

As a people, we could not have survived without the black church. It has been more than a sanctuary—it has been the institution which carried us over. The institution which gave us the modern Moses, Dr. Martin Luther King, whose life was snuffed out by an assassin's bullet. The institution which through all of our struggles remains today the strongest foundation in our community. The black church then has been our crutch to survival.

The history of this Nation is the history of many diverse cultures with many different stories of origin and development in America. The unique history of black Americans began with the chains of involuntary servitude, an institution which created deep rifts in the moral fiber of our Nation. We are still struggling to heal these rifts and wounds.

One of the unique aspects of the black church is the involvement of the leadership of the church in the acquisition of black political power. In recognition of the need for black politicians to have a base from which to win elections in a majority society, black ministers have provided their churches as a forum. Moreover, black ministers have been activists in the political arena. The black minister has—when fitting and appropriate—also utilized his pulpit to speak to political issues and has provided that pulpit as a platform for both white and black politicians, who needed access to the churches' congregation.

Leading black progress in the political arena have been many of America's most distinguished black preachers. One of the Nation's most charismatic politicians was Adam Clayton Powell, pastor of Abyssinian Baptist Church in New York, who was the first black chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. Under Powell's leadership, more social legislation was passed than under any other chairman in the history of the U.S. Congress. Under the astute leadership of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. a Baptist minister, the Afro-American church was instrumental in ending decades of the disenfranchisement of black Americans. Without the black church there could not have been a Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The moral and political leadership offered by Dr. King and Powell is indicative of a role which often has been assumed by black ministers. Another distinguished black preacher, Rev. Jesse Jackson, former aide to Dr. King and president of Operation Push, made history during his first and second bids for the Democratic Party nomination for the Presidency; and Andrew Young, also a minister and former aide to Dr. King was elected to the Congress, and later became the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and currently serves as the mayor of Atlanta. And today, in the U.S. House of Representatives, we see a number of black political leaders who are ministers. WALTER FAUNTROY, FLOYD FLAKE, EDOLPHUS TOWNS, JOHN LEWIS, and BILL GRAY are all ordained ministers.

Religion and politics have long been fused in the Afro-American church. The major black American religious denominations represent a combined membership of approximately 10 million in about 50,000 predominately black churches. These congregations are a part of the 12 million who make up the black voting base in this country.

The power of these 12 million voters is evidenced in the steady increase of elected black officials. Currently, there are 6,829 black elected officials. There are 303 black mayors and 24 black Members of Congress. In 1967, my brother, Judge Carl B. Stokes became a pioneer when he was elected America's first black mayor of a major American city.

Black churches are formidable forces in the mayoral races in major American cities. Dr. King played a significant role in Carl's victory by personally conducting a voter registration drive in Cleveland. Political rallies for the late Harold Washington were commonly held in Chicago's black churches. Wilson Goode, mayor of Philadelphia and a baptist deacon, was successful in his first and second bid for mayor due to the enthusiasm of Philadelphia's black churches. Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles was "discovered" by his pastor, who eventually bacame Bradley's campaign manager.

In the 1988 Presidential election, approximately 8.9 million or 43.6 percent of eligible black voters turned out on November 8. The joint center for political studies states that the black church had a great deal to do with the numbers in both the 1984 and the 1988 Presidential elections. Voter registration efforts by the Afro-American church intensified during the 1984 election primarily due to the campaign of Rev. Jesse Jackson. Over 30,000 black churches pledged to enlist 3 million new voters into the rank and file. Reverend Jackson won 21 percent of primary and caucus votes, 11 percent of the delegates in San Francisco and five States. In 1988, the enthusiasm of the black churches' response to Reverend Jackson's campaign again contributed to voter turnout. During his second bid for the Democratic nomination, Reverend Jackson won 7 primaries and 927 or 29.1 percent of the delegates to the convention in Atlanta, double the number he gained in his 1984 bid.

By now we as politicians arc aware of the resounding voice that the Afro-American church sounds in the black community and in America. This institution is the dominant symbol of the African presence in the United States. The Afro-American church has nurtured its black congregations and enriched the self-respect of black America. Out of the Afro-American church came the first glimmer of hope that tomorrow could be better than yesterday; and that tomorrow begins with solidarity today.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to my distinguished colleague from California, the immediate past chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, Congressman STOKES, for bringing us here today to observe this very important occasion, African-American History Month.

Let me just say, Mr. Speaker, that as a classroom teacher in Los Angeles I had the privilege of teaching American history and what I observed was the absence of any inclusion of black Americans in history text books with the exception of two, Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver.

As a young legislator, I had the privilege of introducing legislation that mandates the inclusion of the accomplishments of black Americans in the history books in California.

So it is very appropriate for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] to bring us together to make known to our friends and people across these United States that this is a very important month to observe the accomplishments of African-Americans in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank our colleagues Congressman STOKES and Congressman DELLUMS for setting aside this time for us to reflect on the history of African-Americans in these United States. I think that built into the human spirit is the desire to believe that as time passes things get better. In our own lives we grow from being totally helpless and dependent on others for all our needs to being able to depend on ourselves and our own abilities. That is progress. The sweep of history is like that too. We think things are better now than they were a hundred years ago. So, we think naturally of history as the history of progress.

The history of African-Americans in the United States only partially fits that image of history. Sometimes we take a step backward. Among the treatments of African-American history being presented this month was a television segment shown in Washington two Sundays ago. An elderly man recounted the experiences of his great-grandfather who lived and died as a slave. This great-grandfather hungered for freedom. So much so that he tried on several occasions to escape. For his effort, his master shackled him with a 20-pound steel ball that he wore from a chain attached to his leg for the last 20 years of his life. It turns out that this old man was going to have freedom in some way, even if he couldn't enjoy it in his lifetime. He had an axe, and when he died, he instructed his wife to cut his leg off and remove the ball and chain. She did so, and gave his body a kind of symbolic freedom. But the family has kept the ball and chain as a reminder to this day.

None of us has been forced to wear a ball and chain, at least not a visible one. So, we could say that progress has been made. But I know too that there are parts of the Los Angeles County area where my district is located where young people are as confined as though they were wearing a ball and chain. There are high schoolers in my district who cannot read, cannot write, cannot add or subtract. And many somehow have lost their sense of value for life itself. The regularity of violent killings involving teenagers and young adults in some areas of Los Angeles County is depressing because it seems to be the outward sign of hopelessness.

It is painful to look at these young people and the extreme limitations they face in a world where literacy is no more than the minimum down payment on freedom. In the last century, most masters forbade their slaves to learn to read or write. It was thought that literacy would make slaves harder to handle. In the midst of that deliberate effort to withhold the tool of literacy from African-Americans, there was a young man whose mistress was impressed with his brightness, and she did the forbidden thing. She taught him the alphabet. When the master found out, he made the lessons stop, but it was too late. The tool was already in the young man's grasp and could not be taken away. His name was Frederick Bailey, and he lived in Baltimore until his wife, a free black, managed to get together enough money to help him escape. So that it would be harder for those who hunted down runaway slaves to find him, he changed his name to Frederick Douglass.

Frederick Douglass's rise to leadership in the effort to extend human and civil rights to African-Americans should be instructive for us today. His uniqueness was recognized even by his owners. He was an outstanding individual, and there was no adversity difficult enough to quench the fire of his intelligence or his vision. That is what outstanding people are like. They overcome all the obstacles that would defeat normal people. Most people are normal.

A few years ago, there was an administrative assistant here who worked for a moderate Republican. The AA had been the chairman of a university chemistry department before coming to the Hill. He found himself in a conversation one evening about the need for aid to educate the disadvantaged. He told those listening about one of his graduate students, an African-American, the first such graduate student his department ever had. He pointed out that this student was a superior student in every way. He was extremely well prepared for graduate study, and he sailed through his graduate studies. There was no perceptible discrimination against this excellent student. The point of this account was that this student was offered as proof that African-Americans can make it in the system as it exists. There is no particular need for aid. The student who applies himself can excel regardless of color.

This former chairman had encountered an exceptional individual, one of those people who makes it look easy to excel. But he was the only African-American graduate student that chemistry department ever had. For every superstar whose brilliance cuts through racism and disadvantage, there are thousands who could succeed were they given the chance.

Frederick Douglass knew that, and dedicated his life to seeing that others would not have to withstand the trials he had to withstand in order to succeed at their life's ambition. It should be a matter of great pride to us that throughout our history, many of our most outstanding individuals have had the kind of regard for their people that has driven them to spend much of their lives working to extend opportunity to those who need a helping hand to overcome disadvantage.

I am privileged to know many of those outstanding and dedicated people. They will be the historic root of the advances that will be made by our children and their children in the coming decades. And they have been the strong arms that have tried mightily to hold the door of educational opportunity open during a trying decade for African-Americans. We know that science and technology are going to be dominant forces in our lives and the lives of future generations. I want to mention a few of the people who are working to see that African-Americans will continue to make history in the sciences.

When the history of access to education is written, our own colleague, Congressman Augustus Hawkins, will be among the heroes. His hand has guided the major Federal education programs of our era to the lawbooks. There are others who may not be as often in the public eye, but whose work is not unnoticed by those who know what it has taken to keep hope alive. There is Dr. Jim Rosser, president of California State University at Los Angeles. Through this decade he has made his institution a place where people of all racial and ethnic backgrounds can receive a first quality education and not have to sacrifice their cultures or identities in the process. There is Bernard Charles of the Carnegie Corp. who has targeted major private funding toward minority education programs at a time in history when those funds have become less available from Federal sources. There is Dr. Shirley Malcom of the American Association for the Advancement of Science whose Linkages program is showing church pastors, girl scout leaders, the Urban League, and every other community based organization she can find how to give African-American children the educational boost they need. There is Dr. Howard Adams of the Graduate Degrees in Engineering for Minorities or GEM Program, whose efforts are responsible for a staggering percentage of all the graduate degrees in engineering that have gone to African-Americans in the past 10 years. And there is Dr. Shirley McBay of MIT, chairwoman of the National Science Board's Advisory Committee on Women, Minorities and the Handicapped in Science and Technology. The programs of the National Science Foundation aimed at minority access to science are the fruit of her committee's guidance. Dr. McBay is also director of the Quality Education for Minorities or QEM project which is in the process of identifying the most effective minority education programs in the country and deriving from those efforts a national plan for the successful education of minority students. Right here in Washington, there is Mel Thompson, director of the Research Institute for Science, Space, and Technology at Howard who is striving to make businesses and universities working partners in the higher education of African-American students.

You see that our history even to the present moment is peopled with heroes, people of outstanding ability who have turned their talents to advancing not just African-Americans but all those who have suffered disadvantages because of prejudice, gender discrimination, or physical disability. My strongest hope as one elected to represent the people is that we have at last passed through the period of Federal indifference to the needs of the people. It is time for this Government to consider once again becoming our heroes' partners rather than their antagonists. In the past decade these leaders have had to put all their effort into seeing that this country did not march wholesale back into the 19th century. I hope that a year from now we can say of 1989 that it was the year our Government turned around and finally began to march with the people's leaders into the 21st century. May 1989 be a year of progress, not another year of retrenchment.

Mr. STOKES. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VISCLOSKY].

Mr. VISCLOSKY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend and thank the gentleman from Ohio for setting aside time today for this special order to celebrate Black History Month.

All across the United States in schools, museums, libraries, community organizations and churches, people are taking the time to recognize and honor the contributions of black Americans to the history of this Nation. Since the beginning of our Nation's history there have been countless individual black Americans who have made important contributions to this great Nation.

However, also important is the role that African-American churches have played in the history of our Nation. The church has always been more than just a place of worship. From its beginnings in the late 18th century the African-American church has been a very important institution.

At various times it has been a place where children have been educated, a place where political activity has started and a place where the righting of social wrongs was initiated.

One of the church's first leaders was Richard Allen. He was born a slave but was allowed to buy his own freedom. In 1786 he worked as a lay minister among black members of Philadelphia's St. George Methodist Episcopal Church. Because of his work, and the work of Absalom Jones, the black membership of the congregation grew 10 times larger. However church officials became worried and imposed strict rules to segregate black worshipers.

Ultimately, Allen and Jones were physically removed from the church while praying and black members left en masse. Thereafter, Allen and Jones organized the Free African Society. In 1791 it became the African Church, and in 1816 Allen founded the African Methodist Episcopal [AME] Church.

The AME Church is one of the largest and oldest African-American churches in existence. It has grown into an international denomination with a membership of more than 1 million. It operates 11 colleges and schools of religion and its business and social service entities include housing developments, homes and programs for senior citizens, a hospital and a camping facility. It is just one example of how the church has interwoven itself with the lives of its members and become an important part of our country's social fabric.

Moreover, one cannot talk about the role of the church and black Americans without recognizing the great achievements of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. He is remembered more as a leader of social change than a theologian. But let us not forget that as a church leader he became the leader of the civil rights movement.

He and his work are the best examples of why we should take the time to recognize and honor the contributions of black Americans to our Nation's history.

Mr. STOKES. I thank my distinguished colleague for his significant contribution to this special order.

□ 1440

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Georgia who is also a black minister, my distinguished colleague [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding me this time and thank him for calling this special order today.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk about a man who I consider one of the founding fathers of the "New America." He was the leader of the second revolution in this Nation. He led a revolution of new ideas and new values in this Nation.

This year's theme for Black History Month is "The Role of Black Churches in Economic, Political and Social Development at Home and Abroad." The black church has always been the one place where black people could gather to discuss those issues and work to solve economic, political, and social problems in our community. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., used his ties with the black church to stir a movement. That movement uplifted this Nation from the pit of segregation and discrimination to the mountaintop of justice and brotherhood.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was a minister who was trying to make his religion relevant to the needs of the people. I admired that. In my mind, King was a Moses, using organized religion and the emotionalism within the black church as an instrument, a vehicle toward freedom and change.

Martin Luther King, Jr., more than any other American of the 20th century, had the power to bring more people together to do good—black and white, protestant, Catholics and Jews, young and old, rich and poor.

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s message was love. His weapon was truth. His method was creative nonviolence. His goal was the beloved community—a community of justice, peace, and love. He was a gentle man who used the teachings of Jesus and the tools of Gandhi. He was a radical Christian, far too advanced in his concepts of love and peace for the violent times in which he lived.

Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke to the hearts and conscience of all of us who believed that nonviolence and love offer a more excellent way. This good man, this God-fearing man, gave us hope in a time of hopelessness. This good man, this man of God, this son of the South, this son of America produced light in dark places. Martin Luther King, Jr., had the ability to bring the dirt and filth from under the American rug, out of the cracks and corners into the open light in order for us to deal with it.

Perhaps Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, greatest contribution was bringing the entire human community together in a caring and sharing beloved community, for it was Dr. King's greatest strength to inspire people to reach out and help others.

As we conclude this year's celebration of Black History Month, let us work to support courageous leaders, like Martin Luther King, Jr. Men and women who will work to redirect the priorities and the tremendous resources of this Nation, not to oppress, but to uplift; not to divide, but to bring together; and not to enslave, but to set free.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague from Georgia for his contribution.

At this time I yield as much time as he may consume to my other distinguished colleague from the State of Georgia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio for sharing this time.

Mr. Speaker, when I was a small boy growing up in my native Southland, there was a quiet, gentle force of freedom at work. An irresistible force of spirit that was to forever dislodge the immovable object of racial segregation and so-called white supremacy.

This force was natural born in the human heart. It was bred by loving families around the hearths of countless red clay cabins, but it was ultimately nourished to fruition by the church. The African-American church has been the deep well from which generations have drawn the pure taste of righteousness. The church was the educational, social, and political center of black community life—it was an oasis of liberty and a sanctuary of freedom. There, the voices of justice could speak more freely, there the burdens of oppression could be shared, thus lightening the load upon the soul.

By being a lighthouse of hope for African-Americans, by being a fountain of faith for a people who had suffered the greatest indignity of human existence, the black church's place in the history of man's struggle for personal and spiritual freedom is forever engraved in the solid granite of our Nation's foundation.

Indeed, it was there that the true promise of the American dream was kept alive for us all. Where the verities of justice, opportunity, and equality were developed from abstract rhetoric to daily reality, where the flame of liberty was kept burning to light the way for all Americans. We are a better nation for their enduring patience, perseverance, and courage. For this we the people owe a great debt of gratitude to our Nation's black churches.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague for his statement and his participation in this special order.

I am pleased to yield as much time as he may consume to my distinguished colleague from the State of Kentucky [Mr. HUBBARD].

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to rise today to pay tribute to Black History Month. I want to thank my distinguished colleague, the Honorable LOUIS STOKES, for organizing this special order today so that we might all have the opportunity to reflect on the important contributions of black Americans to the life of this country.

I note that the theme for Black History Month this year is the role of the Afro-American church in economic, political, and social development at home and abroad. It is a topic near to my heart, for as the son of a Baptist minister and his wife, I saw at first hand, and often, the power of devotion and its ability to transform lives—not only the lives of individuals but the lives of entire communities.

The black church has shown that kind of transforming power to all Americans. In the earliest days of our society, many of our ancestors came to this continent to escape intolerable persecution for their religious beliefs. They came and established congregations and practiced their beliefs freely.

But later, when the ancestors of black Americans came, they came into a situation even more oppressive than that of religious persecution—they came into a world of bondage and servitude. Yet there was always the refuge of the church where they kept alive the hope for freedom and the dream of a world where all people were equal—for the eyes of God did not see the color of a man or woman's skin.

Through the long years of slavery and through the later years of persecution, the church and its dream of equality stayed alive in the hearts of the devout. That's why it was no surprise to me that many of those in the forefront of the civil rights movement were ministers in the black church. Dr. Martin Luther King, the man we so rightly honor for leading the fight for the right for black Americans to participate fully as citizens in their own country, was first a minister, the leader of Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta, GA. But the dream that Dr. King so courageously spoke of was not a dream that was newly born with him. He was speaking a very American dream that was the dream of generations before him—the dream that people and a nation can be transformed and made better.

That is why it is altogether appropriate today that we pay tribute to the black church and recognize its importance not only to black Americans but to Americans of all colors. It is a model and an inspiration to us all. It is something that Americans can point to with pride and say:

Here is where a dream was kept alive. Here is where idealism and justice prevailed. Here is where a better America was born.

Mr. Speaker, it has given me great pleasure to participate in today's special orders and I again want to commend and thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio for organizing this event.

□ 1450

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HUBBARD], for his excellent remarks on this occasion, and I appreciate his participation.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this time to yield to another of my colleagues who is himself one of America's distinguished black ministers, the head of one of the most recognized black churches in America. It is indeed a pleasure at this time to yield to a distinguished pastor, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE].

Mr. FLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] and I commend the gentleman who represents for us the historicity of a people personified in a very important contributing ministry and service here in the House. It is certainly with pleasure that I stand before the House today and address the Members and bring before the Members a concern as it relates to this African-American History Month celebration and how we as a people have been able to forge ahead in spite of difficulties and circumstances, and the role the church has played in that process and how the church continues to speak to the conditions and concerns and lift the hopes of people who find themselves in a state of despair.

Today, as I consider this address, one of the concerns that I would like to have the Members note is that 202 years ago in America, founded by an ex-slave, Richard Allen, was the African Methodist Episcopal Church and founded by persons who could not worship as they choose. In fact, George's Methodist Church in Philadelphia was having to worship in a balcony, and in going down to the lower floor to worship among the white members of that congregation, they were bodily removed from it and thrown out into the street. But that throwing out became an opportunity for the formulation of a church that has been able to survive now for some 202 years, with over 2,100,000 members, members who have grown because they have a determination and a desire to continue to see the light and the quality of life and conditions of a people continue to change. And in that 202-year history, Richard Allen, through his contribution, was able to make the introduction of the first weekly black newspaper in America, the AME Christian Reporter, the first monthly that was ever produced in black America, the AME Review, and out of that the community developed the first insurance company for blacks and for blacks the first opportunity to be involved in the process of elections and in politics.

The reality is that as we look back on the history of African-Americans in America, the church has played a major role. It has been at the forefront of whatever changes have taken place in the post-Civil War era, in the Reconstruction Era in America, and it was indeed the black church that produced the leadership that ultimately occupied the seats in the legislatures throughout the Nation and throughout the many States in which they assumed roles. It was those persons who ultimately were to make the description of what was to happen as it relates to the plight of black people.

So as we moved from that era through the various stages of life where these persons participated in American culture and in its many wars, in the many battles that took place to bring about democracy to other nations, many of those persons coming back from the battlefield were finding that there was hypocrisy in their own Nation, with an inability to be able to get jobs that seemed to be rightfully theirs by virtue of the fact that they had gone forth to fight for the rights of their Nation, and yet coming home to suffer oppression and to suffer the brutality and abuse of a people who were locked on the outside.

Through the ages the black church has been able to speak to those conditions, to lift them, to give them a sense of hopefulness in the midst of what appeared to be a helpless situation, and in the 1960's, as we got caught in the dichotomy between the discussion of what constituted black power on the one side, the sociological definitions of black power which required or considered the taking-over of cities and the taking-over of governments, led by persons like Rod Karenga and Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown, but on the other side the counterbalance to that dichotomy represented by persons like James Cone, professor at Union Theological Seminary, Gayraud Wilmore, C. Eric Lincoln, J. DeOtis Roberts, and others who put into some theological framework and understanding that the hope of a people relied on an ability to be able to continue a relationship with God, a God that Martin Luther King lifted to a point where people could feel a sense of dignity in moving in a nonviolent social protest manner through the churches and into the communities to make a difference for the world.

It is out of that historicity that evolves even to this day the hope for black America, an America where we have seen ravaged the communities where it appears that the riots of the 1960's will never be repaired, where it seems that the dream of ultimately making it to the promised land that was the promise for those who were on their way, on a journey or a pilgrimage from slavery to freedom, it seems to many that that reality will never take place. And yet as we examine the black church and we see that it is still strong, we see that it still makes an expression, we see that it still provides the necessary services to give people the possibility of ultimately making that journey complete and fulfilling the dream of persons like Martin Luther King, there is the reality that one day it will truly happen.

So as we celebrate this African-American History Month, it is the black church that calls upon all of America to recommit itself to a new vision, a vision of understanding, a vision of brotherhood, a vision of sharing, a vision of concern, so that in our educational community, through the leadership of the black church, we can assure that the dropout rate in America does not continue to be as it is for African-American youth, that the unemployment rate does not continue to be four times that for African-American youth versus that of young American white males, that in America, the Nation that is a democracy, the Nation where we take great pride in being able to join together in the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance, but also believing deep down in our hearts that those last words of that pledge are taken to heart by all the citizens of this Nation, we are one Nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

The declaration of the church is that somehow we can live better, we can live without the homeless crisis being as severe as it is, and that we can live without AIDS continuing to be a problem that is not addressed by this society.

The black church will take a position. The black church will move forward. The black church attacks the problem of drugs and feels that it is time for the Nation to join in the battle so that it does not become and continue to be a one-sided war. The black church continues to speak to the needs of people. The African Methodist Episcopal Church, the AME Zion Church, the Church of God in Christ, the National Baptist Convention, and the Progressive Baptist Convention have all committed themselves to the proposition that just as the church was the bulwark that has brought African-Americans to this point in history, they will continue to do so by developing communities, by continuing to mobilize people, by continuing to improve the quality of life, and if all Americans can look beyond the color of skin and wake up to a new sense of common camaraderie, a new sense of sharing, and a new sense of involvement one with another, then I believe that this America can indeed be the land of the free and the home of the brave.

Our plea from the black church is that America practices what it preaches, and that in America, as we all march behind the same flag and make the same Pledge of Allegiance, we will indeed be a nation of one, one people under God and indivisible.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for giving me this opportunity to participate in his special order.

□ 1500

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE] for his eloquence on this occasion and for the meaning he has given to this special order.

I am pleased now to yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MFUME], my distinguished colleague and friend.

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, let me just also commend the chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] who, like many of my colleagues, has taken the time to convene here on this special day, this special month in this special Nation. And I am particularly happy to have followed in this special order, although it was not by design, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE] who preceded me. He is my friend and colleague, and he does not only represent this Congress well, but he represents eloquently and with great passion the cause of the black church here in this Nation.

It is a bit ironic, Mr. Speaker, that I would be asked to give remarks, as I have, on this subject of the black church and then to be faced with the fact of having to follow a minister. In fact there is probably nothing more devastating than having to follow a minister except to have to be buried by one, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE] is my friend, and I certainly take time to join in these efforts and to bring some remarks on this, the last day of February, what was originally known by Carter G. Woodson as Negro History Week, which then became Negro History Month and, as we know it today, Black History Month.

So today does mark the final day in the month dedicated to celebrating the accomplishments and contributions of our Nation's African community. I would like to again personally thank all of our colleagues who have taken to the floor today, entered record statements and in one way or another participated in the events that have been held in their prospective districts to commemorate this month.

Six weeks ago I sat down to prepare remarks for a community organization in Baltimore on the importance of celebrating Black History Month, and, after reviewing the materials and the notes that I had compiled, it became convincingly clear that it was very hard to narrow my focus on any one specific aspect because the topic is so vast. In fact it is as vast as the many years and the individuals who comprise the history.

However one institution again must be recognized as having the most profound effect on the African-American community and on our Nation as a whole, and I speak again of the role of the black church. Traditionally the local congregation has been the center of hope for the black communities. Isolated politically and economically by what was historically mainstream America, African-ancestored Americans looked to the church for both spiritual guidance and motivation. After the fall of the antebellum South, or as John Hope Franklin once described slavery as that peculiar institution, and after the disappointments of Reconstruction, the church was able to assume an even greater role in our community once the controls established during the times of slavery were lessened. However, the stringent restrictions of Jim Crow in Southern secular life contributed considerably to the separation of black people and white people in the religious institutions as we know them, and somehow out of sheer necessity black ministers were not confined to typical parameters of preaching and teaching. They went beyond that to lead and to give guidance.

Mr. Speaker, black ministers were rewarded as ecumenical and civic leaders because their position within an independent institution gave them the freedom and gave them the authority to speak out publicly and prophetically. They often spoke out about the condition of African-ancestored Americans in our South. Throughout much of the history of the African diaspora the church was something that we as descendents of Africa viewed as being exclusively ours. The church was the only option that permitted my forefathers to exercise their right to make autonomous decisions not permitted in other segments of our society.

So, Mr. Speaker, the grassroots organizing and community service that the church has provided over the past two centuries has been an indispensable asset in the development of black people. Black denominations dedicated their scarce resources quite simply to educating and training their people for trade, professional and ecumenical service. Many early predominately black schools throughout the South, in fact throughout other parts of our country, came into existence from the desire and the dedication that the church provided through formal Christian education to former slaves and free men.

The early church-related schools were chronically strapped for funds, but seldom are we able to find in history that that prevented the dedicated teachers they had from shunning their moral responsibilities and their professional responsibilities to eager pupils, and while many teachers in the church-related schools were educated in Northern liberal colleges and universities, their Christian upbringing and commitment encouraged them to return and to contribute their talents to their communities.

Perhaps, if any one statement could be used to summarize the importance of the black church, it would be that the church instilled a sense of pride, a sense of peoplehood, a sense of belonging, a sense of self-reliance. Throughout the turbulence of the civil rights era leaders used the church buildings to organize the rallies and used the church buildings and the pulpits to reassure freedom-loving members of their movement that their faith and that their forward-looking vision would build bridges to justice and break down the barriers of Jim Crow and segregation forever.

Looking back on my own life, I can honestly say that the songs that I sang and heard long ago in the church still motivate me and many others today to strive and to drive toward the goals that I have set for myself and we have set as a people that we continue to strive for as a nation. Today, with the plague of drugs and its concomitant violence, the church still has a vital role in helping to provide alternatives for our young people.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES], the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS], the Congressional Black Caucus Chairman, certainly ought to be commended for not letting this month come to an end without an appropriate floor tribute, and, while every month should be dedicated to learning more about various people and more about history, this month is of particular importance because America's future depends on our need to understand and our need to cooperate with one another.

Finally, it was the late Dr. Benjamin Mays who said to us that he who starts behind in life must either run faster or forward remain behind. Those who ran faster are using the church here and the church there to serve as a bridge over troubled waters and prove to us that Kravel was indeed right when he said that the maximum hope is always closest to the maximum danger, that Martin King was right when he said that for the true believer the darkness is light enough, for it must, said Mays, be borne in mind that the tragedy in life does not lie in not reaching your goal; the tragedy lies in having no goal to reach. It is not a calamity to die with dreams unfulfilled, but it is, he said, a calamity not to dream at all. It is not a disaster not to be able to capture your ideal. Yes, but it does become a disaster to have no ideal to capture. It is not a disgrace not to reach the stars, but it is a disgrace to have no stars for which to reach. Not failure, he said, but low aim is sin.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are indebted as a people, as a nation, as a world for the role of the church in the African-ancestored communities that taught us to aim high and taught us to move forward.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Maryland, for his contribution to this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this time to yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

My father has said of this Government that there are too many people making history who have never read history.

In this country, black history is a part of American history. The thing that makes it particularly significant is that it so long was an ignored part of American history. It is the part of wisdom for all Americans to play what might be called catch-up ball, to study up, find this lost element of American history, and we will understand all the better how much that element of American history inevitably enriches American history.

It is almost, in fact it is entirely unique, among the phases of history in our country that black people in America have made accomplishments beyond what might have been expected because of the oppression, then it must have had something to do with Shakespeare's statement:

> Sweet are the uses of adversity. It is like a toad, ugly and venomous, but there is yet within its head a jewel.

Your best friend, they say, is your worst enemy, because he keeps you fed, and the adversity of the black experience in the United States is not only a matter of shame for our Nation, which many Americans want to overcome, it is a strengthening process, an unfortunate but strengthening process.

It is absolutely the right thing to do to recognize this during this month. I express my admiration to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] and the others who have spoken here today.

In the late election the Pledge of Allegiance was celebrated, perhaps in a rather strange way, but if anybody cares to remember what it says, it does say "one Nation under God", and that, too, is a part of American history and a part which, it seems to me as we learn more about it, we should improve on.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Indiana, for his eloquence on this occasion.

Mr. Spearker, I am pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI].

□ 1520

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding and for his correctness in having taken this special order out today to celebrate February, Black History Month.

Mr. Speaker, I would just tell the gentleman from Ohio, the dean of the delegation, there are three people I would briefly like to commemorate today, two of whom have passed to a greater reward, one of whom is still alive. The three are from my community, Louisville, Jefferson County, KY.

The gentlewoman who is still with us and has compiled a remarkable career during her public service is my friend, State Senator Georgia Powers. Georgia and I were elected together in 1967 to the Kentucky State Senate, took office together in January 1968, and I observed Georgia up very close during those sessions that I served until I came here to Congress. She continued to serve for 21 years. She served as a leading person in that assembly.

Georgia was the first black person, as well as the first black woman, to be elected to the Kentucky State Senate. Georgia has, after that long and distinguished career, decided it was time for her to move to new fields. She will lecture and write and put together her thoughts on the sweep of history as she has seen it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to certainly suggest that her name, and she, are richly entitled to be included in this pantheon of black American leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention two who have gone away. One was Alderman Lois Morris. Her husband Ralph is a good friend of mine, as was Lois, of course. She served three terms on our board of aldermen; she was leader there in civil rights activities, rights for minorities.

The second person who served richly in Louisville and is now dead is Dr. Grace James, who was a practicing physician for over 30 years, set up clinics to serve the underprivileged, the minorities, took a very special interest in teenage pregnancies and the prevention thereof, provided health care services to people who had no other access to such services.

Mr. Speaker, for these three people, State Senator Georgia Powers and the two departed friends of mine, Alderman Lois Morris and Dr. Grace James, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that they should be commemorated during this month during which we commemorate the black leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in the House in commemorating February as Black History Month.

The outstanding achievements which black Americans have made to our Nation over the 2 centuries of its existence make it fitting that we set aside this month to honor and remember some of these individuals.

In 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, known as the Father of Black History, established Negro History Week—in 1976 it was extended to a month—because he recognized the need for all Americans to remember the history and culture of black Americans.

There are now and have been many black achievers in the United States. I am proud to say that many of these individuals who are worthy of such honor have lived in Louisville and Jefferson County, KY, the district I am honored to represent in Congress. Dr. Grace James and Alderman Lois Morris, who both recently passed away, and State Senator Georgia Powers are among black persons whose lifelong dedication and service have greatly enhanced our community.

Senator Powers, who recently retired from public office after 21 years of service, is a friend and former colleague in the Kentucky State Senate. Georgia and I were both elected to the Kentucky Senate in 1967. Georgia was not only the first black person to be elected to the Kentucky Senate, but also the first woman.

While in the Senate, she was a strong proponent of civil rights for the underprivileged and for minorities. She was a sponsor of the Kentucky equal rights amendment and worked to eliminate race identification from drivers' licenses. She also served as chairman of the Senate's Labor and Industry Committee and was considered by many observers to be the most prominent spokesperson in the general assembly for minorities and women.

I am proud to honor Senator Powers' many accomplishments as a public official, as a woman, and as a black citizen of our community.

Another great black American was Grace James, a physician. Dr. James served the city of Louisville and its black community for some 37 years before passing away. From providing health care to all in need to promoting civil rights, Dr. James was an inspiration to all around her.

Some of her more important contributions in the medical field were: Being the first black woman to serve on the faculty of the University of Louisville School of Medicine, and establishing the West End Medical Center, a health facility in the inner city area of Louisville where she attended to more than 100 patients weekly.

Not only was Dr. James concerned with health, but also with pressing issues such as teen-age pregnancy and education. She founded the teen awareness project to help prevent teen-age pregnancy. And, while serving as president of the Louisville chapter of the NAACP, she fought for better educational opportunities for blacks in the public school system.

Dr. James was a true asset to her people and community. Her tireless work for blacks and the disadvantaged serve as a model for others to follow.

Another black Louisvillian deserving recognition is Mrs. Lois Morris. Mrs. Morris, who recently passed away, was elected to Louisville's Board of Aldermen from its 12th ward in 1969, and served three consecutive terms. While in office, Lois was a champion for blacks, women, and the disadvantaged.

Before coming to office Alderman Morris was active in the field of education. Not only did she earn master's degrees in Political Science and International Law from Catholic University but she then went on to teach at high schools in Maryland, Mississippi, and Virginia.

Alderman Morris' achievements went beyond education and public office though. She founded and served as the president of the Louisville chapter of the National Council of Negro Women and was secretary of the Southern Black Caucus. Furthermore, she founded—and served as executive director of—National Black Women for Political Action and was a member of the Louisville Urban League and its women committee.

These three individuals—through their hard work, dedication, and tenacity—have been and are invaluable assets to our community and are worthy of special recognition this month. It gives me great pride to be able to honor State Senator Georgia Powers, Doctor Grace James, and Alderman Lois Morris for their outstanding achievements.

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to join with my colleagues here today to honor the contributions of black Americans throughout the course of history.

It is especially appropriate that the theme for National Black History Month this year is the role of Afro-American churches. Like threads of a fine, strong tapestry, the history of our churches is tightly interwoven with our cultural and political history.

Churches have had a profound influence on our lives, from the days of slavery throughout the arduous civil rights struggle, and continuing in the face of today's challenges. In our houses of worship, we have reaffirmed our faith in God, in the future, and in each other. We have mourned senseless losses, and we have rejoiced in hard-fought victories.

It is fitting that we should pay tribute to our religious leaders, who provided moral backbone in our fight for justice and equality. Throughout times of great upheaval, ministrers and church leaders imparted the spiritual strength, courage, and tenacity which brought about social change.

I am proud of the contributions made by churches and religious leaders in my State of New Jersey. Continuing in a long activist tradition, our churches are working to meet the needs of local communities in today's rapidly changing world.

Churches are making a tremendous difference in the everyday lives of so many of our citizens, young and old. In my district, churches offer day care for children and adults. To ease the plight of the homeless, they provide shelter and food for those in need. Affordable housing complexes have been developed by church groups. Food pantries have been organized for emergencies or to help families whose monthly resources run out. Through a church-sponsored program, nutritious fresh food is brought from rural farms and sold economically.

Our churches have been a strong, positive force throughout our history. Today, they remain in the forefront as we face new social and moral issues.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of the progressive role of Afro-American churches, both in New Jersey and throughout our country. As we commemorate Black History Month, let me take this opportunity to commend our churches and religous leaders who continue their tireless work for a better future.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, every year, this time the American public is reminded of the struggle of black Americans in this great country of ours. It is Black History Month again.

It seems that all we can recall in the history of black Americans is the pain, the hardships, and the constant uphill battle for respect and acceptance in our own Nation. What is often overlooked is the fact that black Americans have made a solid contribution to the strength and vitality of America. It has not been all pain and suffering for us. Our many years of bondage and our clashes in the streets against those who wanted to deny us full citizenship did not preclude us from laying our own bricks and mortar on the foundation built by this country's founders more than 200 years ago.

Black Americans, Mr. Speaker, have contributed in innumerable ways. Black Americans have made a noticeable and significant difference in American history.

Black Americans have served in this great body—the U.S. Congress. Black Americans have served as mayors and Federal Cabinet Secretaries in both Democratic and Republican administrations. Black Americans have traveled in outer space. Black Americans have served as generals in our Armed Forces. Black Americans have served as judges and Justices. Black Americans have initiated major medical and technological advances. Black Americans have been some of the most innovative and effective educators this country has ever known.

We have made sweet, sweet music; we have authored hard-hitting pieces of literature; we have accomplished some of the most amazing feats in sports history; we have been in the forefront of many, many social advances that this country has known. We need only look to the past to know what our future could hold as an ethnic group and as Americans.

The future for black America stands to be extremely, extremely bright. Not only does black America stand to gain from the enormous potential with our next generation, but America itself stands to gain from a black America poised to move forward into tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, no ethnic group in this country has been able to make progress without first of all looking at the efforts of its forefathers, then pledging itself to the same high principles and standards adhered to by those ancestors. Furthermore, no ethnic group in America has been able to move even one step forward without agreeing to accept the challenge at hand.

The challenge for black Americans as we move on to the 1990's is to expand the circle of beneficiaries of the phenomenal growth and expansion that we as a people have experienced over the last 20-odd years. Black Americans have come a long way, but many of us remain residents of a deeply oppressed world clouded with despair, hopelessness, and helplessness, all in the shadow of the prosperity and advancement that the rest of us have experienced.

On this, the last day of the annual month-long Black History Month observance, I want to challenge black Americans to do as the ones we are paying homage to. Let's take up a greater share of the mantle. Let's assume a heavier load of the burden. Let's make a greater sacrifice of ourselves, and do more to get involved with bringing about the growth and prosperity of those left behind in our communities, and not just ourselves.

Let it be known, Mr. Speaker, that in 1989, we have realized many years of great progress. Yet our work remains cut out for us; and this way:

Because of the intravenous use of illicit drugs, minorities represent roughly 25 percent of the AIDS cases, and 35 percent of all black and Hispanic AIDS cases are attributed to IV drug use.

The number of blacks using cocaine doubled in a survey comparing pre-1982 to 1986. In a survey of drug-related deaths in 27 metropolitan areas, blacks were about 25 percent of the victims.

In New York City, 76 percent of the crack users are black. Most are between the ages of 18 and 25, a time in life when many people begin to make the stretch run to meaningful, productive lives.

The number of blacks below the Federal established poverty level remains three times that of white Americans. One of every three black families lives below the poverty line, compared to 1 of every 10 for white Americans.

Black males make up about 7 percent of the total U.S. population, but when you walk into the prisons and the jails across this land, 47 percent of the young men you see will be black. And most of them will be there because of involvement with illicit drugs.

In a recent study of urban teens and violence, the University of Maryland School of Medicine found that 1 in every 4 had witnessed a killing. And 6 of every 10 said they knew someone who was killed.

Black unemployment remains almost three times what it is for white Americans. And the economic gap between whites and blacks is further widening—not closing—according to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

We have seen a growth in black business owership, but black businesses make up only 2 percent of all firms in the United States. And these firms get less than half a percent of the gross receipts of American businesses as a whole.

The strains of crime, drugs, and other problems are eroding the strong sense of community that carried us through so much over the years. A congressional task force on the future of African-Americans by the year 2000 tells us that the number of married couples black families has declined from about 75 percent in 1960 to about 50 percent as of 1980.

The children's defense fund tells us that 1 in 4 black children lives in poverty, 1 in 5 lives at risk of becoming a teenage parent, 1 in 6 has no health insurance, and 1 in 7 are at risk of dropping out of school. Furthermore, black children are twice as likely as white children to die in the first year of life, live in substandard housing, or end up in some sort of institution. And black children are three times more likely than white children to die from child abuse or be murdered between the tender ages of 5 and 9.

We are 11 to 12 percent of the population, but a paltry 2 percent of the engineers and scientists. We are about 10 percent of all college students, but earn less than 6 percent of college degrees in science and engineering.

We have a lot to be proud of. But there is still a task at hand for black America. We especially have to find a way to wean ourselves off of the illicit poisons that our Nation is allowing foreign outlaws to ship in without strong resistance. The pioneers that we honor this time of year expect nothing less from us than a full commitment to prosperity for all black Americans, not just for some of us.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker. I would like to express thanks to my colleagues, Mr. STOKES and Mr. DELLUMS, for reserving this special order to honor and recognize the accomplishments and contributions of black Americans. It is an honor and privilege for me to join you in today's special order.

Today marks the end of Black History Month. All across our Nation and abroad, there have been special programs, commemorations, and activities, highlighting past and present contributions of black Americans to our Nation. I am proud and grateful for the heroes and heroines who stood up courageously, often against insurmountable odds, to motivate and propel America toward justice and equality for all. I am equally appreciative of the little people who have with dignity and resolve, worked quietly in numerous communities across my district help us live up to this Nation's founding principles and ideals.

This year's National Black History Month Theme is "The Role of Afro-American Churches in Economic, Political, and Social Development at Home and Abroad." As I thought about the Sixth Congressional District, which I represent, and my own election to Congress, I could not help but reflect on the very important role of the black church.

I can tell you from personal experience that the black church and black ministers are a tremendous source of power and support. When I first decided to run for office, I honestly didn't know if people would listen to what I had to say or even give me an opportunity to speak. I found black ministers and the black church willing to at least listen—they provided me with some of my earliest political forums.

In his 1984 article in Ebony magazine, Thad Martin wrote:

> Born out of racism and beginning with the invisible slave church of the antebellum south and the founding of the first black congregations during the Revolutionary War period, the black church has traditionally been the political pillar of black American society. Through its portals have passed Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the Reverend Jesse Jackson and a throng of other notable black leaders. Beneath its vaulting roofs, the liberation movement of black America was born and nurtured. And at the crux of it all was a burning concern for the political well-being of black America.

The black church continues its tradition of concern activism. In addition to being politically active, the black church has a strong social and moral conscience, providing leadership in the war on drugs, teenage pregnancy, homelessness, and the antiapartheid movement. The black church has continued to provide leadership, as well as leaders. I am very proud to serve in this body with Rev. BILL GRAY and Rev. WALTER FAUNTROY who are dynamic preachers and political leaders.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to participate in today's special order celebrating Black History Month. I am grateful for the political and religious contributions of Afro-American churches and I am proud to pay tribute to them during this very special time of the year.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in commemorating the accomplishments of African-Americans. I would particularly like to pay tribute to contributions which the African-American church has made to our country, from the fight to abolish slavery through the civil rights movement to the present day.

The African-American church has not only been the center of the black community but has been a source of political concern and activism as well. In 1787, African-American Methodists in Philadelphia were relegated to segregated sections of St. George's Church. Richard Allen attempted to fight this segregation by leading a group of black parishioners to worship in the main body of the congregation. While they were in the middle of prayer, they were harassed and eventually forced out by the trustees of the church. This was the first step in the founding of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, which is the watershed of the African-American church.

The A.M.E. Zion Church made its commitment to freedom a central tenet by stating its opposition to slavery in the "Articles of Discipline," the church's constitution. By focusing on slavery in the articles, the A.M.E. Zion Church made its concern clear as an African-American church for African-Americans. Commitment to freedom, justice, and equality became a central force in the church.

Throughout much of African-American history, the church was the only institution that was independent and, therefore, capable of creating political leaders and creating protest organizations. As a strong organization, it played an essential role in asserting the rights of relatively powerless African-Americans.

For example, many members and leaders of the African-American church took on active roles in the abolition struggle. Congregations served as stations on the Underground Railway. Harriet Tubman and Sojourner Truth were members of the A.M.E. Zion Church, and Frederick Douglas was an A.M.E. Zion preacher.

The church served as the gathering place for the community and is a source of community leadership to this day. Many of our country's finest African-American leaders come from the church: Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Andrew Young, and Rev. Jesse Jackson, to name only a few.

We owe a great debt to these notable African-American leaders and many other unnamed leaders in the African-American church. They have been a tremendous force for freedom, justice, and equality and have made a great contribution to our country and to all of our lives.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in the House in commemorating February as Black History Month.

The unique contributions of black Americans are found in all segments of society, including public service, science, medicine, literature, human rights, sports, the arts, and education. Black History Month is a time to reflect on these exceptional contributions and achievements. At the same time, Black History Month offers an opportunity to think about the ideals of the American system of government, and particularly about the struggle of black Americans for equality and justice.

As we enter the 1990's, we can share the pride of black Americans in their accomplishments, but we also have cause for serious concern. The trends in such areas as high infant mortality rates, drug abuse and addiction, and black unemployment, particularly among young black citizens, are especially alarming. Moreover, the numbers of black students studying for professional careers are disturbing indicators of what the future could hold if no action is taken. It is essential that opportunities for black Americans, as for all citizens, be expanded if America is to fulfill its dreams and goals.

An important means of enhancing these opportunities is to increase the participation of black Americans in education. Black citizens have continued to make substantial progress in education in recent years. For example, during the 1970's, high school enrollments among blacks rose from about 1.8 million to 2.2 million students. During the same period, college enrollments among blacks increased from about 600,000 to more than 1 million. Historically black colleges and universities [HBCU's] have continually been at the forefront of the struggle for increased opportunities through higher education. However, in the 1980's, statistics indicate that these enrollment figures for both undergraduate and graduate programs are beginning to decline.

Historically black institutions have become a vital national resource and training ground for black American leaders. As we commemorate Black History Month, I commend the historically black colleges and universities of our Nation for their dedicated efforts and service to black Americans. According to the Department of Education, in 1985, the United States had 99 historically black colleges and universities, 43 public institutions, and 56 private institutions, that had an enrollment of 213,776 students.

The historically black colleges and universities around the country have produced almost 70 percent of all black college graduates in our Nation's history. More than 50 percent of the Nation's black business leaders and publicly elected officials are graduates of black institutions of higher learning, as are 75 percent of blacks with Ph.D. degrees, 80 percent of black Federal judges, and 85 percent of black physicians. These schools have also produced more black baccalureates in engineering, computer sciences, mathematics, and biological and physical sciences than all the other 673 institutions in the 19 Southern States in which HBCU's are located.

Most importantly, these institutions have given many young blacks the essential skills necessary to raise themselves from poverty into the mainstream of American life. HBCU's have made tremendous contributions to our Nation, championing the cause of equal opportunity, quality education, and assuming leadership in providing this opportunity to those who were denied it or could not afford it. As we look to the future, these institutions are expected to produce in excess of 300,000 college graduates each decade.

I am proud to say that 11 historically black colleges and universities reside in the State of North Carolina, a figure that ranks North Caroline as second only to Alabama in the Nation. These institutions include: Barber-Scotia College, Bennett College, Elizabeth City State University, Fayetteville State University, Johnson C. Smith University, Livingstone College, North Carolina A&T State University, North Carolina Central University, Saint Augustine's College, Shaw University, and Winston-Salem State University. The HBCU 's of North Carolina have and will continue to make significant contributions to the education of a large segment of the North Carolina population. In fact, the HBCU's in our State have awarded approximately 30 percent of all degrees conferred upon black North Carolinians in the areas of medicine, law, and other important fields.

In my own congressional district resides one of these distinguished institutions, North Caroline Central University, in Durham. NCCU was founded in 1910 by the late Dr. James E. Shepard, who served as its president until 1947. As the first State-supported liberal arts college for black people in the country, NCCU has made invaluable contributions to the advancement of North Carolina and the Nation, and continues to train leaders in the professions, education, the arts, and public life. To this day, the administration, faculty, alumni, and over 5,000 students of North Carolina Central University embody the principles of Dr. Shepard, which are appropriatedly expressed by the school's slogan, "Truth and Service".

In my view, greater educational opportunity is the key to a better life for all Americans. As we consider the plight of education for black Americans in the next few decades, we must remember that black achievement benefits not only blacks, but the Nation as a whole. As our country continues to experience economic growth, we must ensure that all our citizens are prepared and equipped to take on the new challenges that we will face. It is, therefore, in the interest of all Americans to support efforts to help young people of every race to develop their talents to the fullest.

Historically black colleges and universities are an integral part of this advancement. However, we must remember that much work needs to be done to assist these institutions in striving for this goal. Blacks are still underrepresented in many important fields, such as the sciences, engineering, medicine, law and public service. It is imperative that we find ways to increase black representation and participation in these fields and enhance the quality of programs in black institutions in order to prepare for the uncertainties that lie ahead. We must utilize the full potential of all of our natural resources. Historically black institutions are an important national asset that have and will continue to help us to fulfill this mission.

It is for this reason that, during Black History Month, I salute the exemplary and essential role that historically black colleges and universities have played in the struggle for better lives for black Americans, and in the end, for all Americans.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to share a quote from Abraham Lincoln, Second Annual Message to Congress, December 1, 1862:

> Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves. * * * In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve.

That highlights the importance of our history.

The month of February is Black History Month and it is fitting to remember a moment when Mr. Lincoln taught us that the United States cannot escape its history. Many great people, such as Martin Luther King, Barbara Jordan, and Frederick Douglass, have had great impact on the course of black history. There are many fine examples of the contributions of African Americans to the United States. This month is time to learn from history and learn from our successes, as well as from the mistakes.

Many strides have been made in the civil rights movement in recent years. Unfortunately, recent incidents of racial discrimination, marches by groups espousing hate, and the election of a Ku Klux Klan member to a State legislature remind us that the job of spreading tolerance and fighting for equality is not finished.

We must do more to erase the racism that still lives throughout our Nation. The legislative steps taken in the sixties were breakthroughs, but we must follow through on those actions and enforce the law. There would be no greater shame than to embark on this great crusade, only to fail when victory is within our grasp.

We must do more to expand employment and educational opportunities for young black people. An unemployment rate of nearly 40 percent among black youths is unacceptable, especially when the Nation as a whole is enjoying a period of growth.

We must do more to reduce infant mortality rates in the United States. The United States ranks 19th among industrialized nations in infant mortality. Many of these children who die or who are low-weight babies are born to women who live in poverty, many of whom are black. Access to maternal and infant care for all Americans must be a national priority.

In closing, I hope that if only one thing is learned by the American people during Black History Month it would be a quote by Martin Luther King, Jr., which I would like to share with you: "Life's most persistent and urgent question is, what are you doing for others?" Let us fulfill our vocations and put an end to racial and economic discrimination.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of Black History Month. This month was designated as Black History Month by Congress to focus national attention on black Americans—their struggle against individual and institutionalized racism, their priceless contributions to this country, and their determined fight against the oppression of human dignity.

This special month highlights the pages of America's history that too often are ignored or denied, the pages containing the names of black men and women who gave their talents, their vision, and sometimes their lives for their country and their people. Black History Month is a time to celebrate the black heroes and heroines of yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

When colonialized America sought to break from Britain's tyrannical rule, black men filled the ranks of the Armed Forces to make that possible. Crispus Attucks, a black man, was the first person killed in the Revolutionary War, a war in which our goal was freedom. Ironically, the same black men who fought and died for the freedom of our country were later denied that same liberty by the Government that they helped create.

When our fledgling Republic was nearly severed irreparably by the Civil War, blacks joined the ranks of the Union to aid in putting down the rebellion of the South. These black regiments of the North fought in battlefields across the tattered country to maintain the Union and secure the blessings of liberty for blacks in the South. While they fought for freedom above ground, Harriet Tubman led hundreds of blacks down the tracks to freedom by way of the Underground Railroad. Harriet Tubman's deep and enduring commitment to human dignity and her willingness to risk her life in the cause of justice remains an inspiration today for all Americans.

In 1863, President Lincoln dealt a great blow to racial inequality with the announcement of the Emancipation Proclamation, declaring all men free. While this monumental step toward equality was great indeed, it was only what would be a first step in a long journey to freedom and equality.

Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., who I had the great privilege of meeting, did much to speed that journey. Growing up in the South during the bleak era of segregation, Dr. King crystalized his views on racial equality while studying theology and later shared his beliefs from the pulpits of countless churches throughout the country. Dr. King believed that all people stood equally before their Maker, endowed with the same rights and dignity. This fact, he urged, must be recognized by our Government; it must be reflected in our education system; it must be reflected in our judicial system; it must be reflected in every aspect of our society. Anything less is an assault on human dignity and, in fact, erodes the foundations of a democratic society. As Dr. King so eloquently wrote from his cell in the Birmingham jail, "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere."

Dr. King dreamed of an America where his children would receive the same education as his white neighbors, where his black brothers and sisters could sit down at a lunch counter with white men and women, and where people were not judged by the color of their skin, but rather by their skills, their talents, and their contributions to society.

Today, as we stand together in tribute to Dr. King and all the black heroes and heroines who have enriched our American story, we look forward to the leaders of tomorrow who will continue the struggle for racial equality that has not yet been won.

America's future is now ours to shape. We can take the opportunity now to build a future of opportunity and equality by investing in public education for those who cannot afford private schooling. We can build a better future by providing assistance to parents struggling to care for their children and forge a successful career. We can build a better future by providing decent and affordable housing for those who are in need. We can build a better future by providing basic health care to the millions of Americans who have none.

We must make a way for Americans of all colors, creeds, and backgrounds to live in decency and dignity. A place where rights are an integral part of the fabric of this Nation, respected and observed every day of the year.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in celebrating Black History Month. We are all familiar with the contributions made by black men and women to the history of our country. Often overlooked, however, is the role played by certain institutions in the black community.

I doubt that any cultural fixture did more to promote civil rights than the churches. As a source of comfort, support, education, and strength, local Afro-American churches provided its members with a strong sense of community and dignity.

Before the Civil War, when the United States was still afflicted with the ill of slavery, small churches gave spiritual strength to those whose bodies were enchained. Often the only educated black men in the area, local preachers attempted to teach slaves to read and write. The inspirational sermons and hymns taught parishioners that slavery was not inevitable, and that the color of a man's skin did not and should not make his freedom any less valuable than that of a white man.

During the 1960's, Afro-American churches were the leading voice for a growing body of Americans who did not believe that society could continue to treat blacks as second class citizens. As organizers and educators, the church pushed this Nation forward toward equal rights for all.

The Afro-American church has seen the end of slavery and the expansion of civil rights and continues to struggle against racial prejudice and bigotry. That struggle, I am sad to say, is not over. As society struggles to provide equal rights for all citizens, I know that the Afro-American churches will remain on the front lines of that fight.

Mr. Speaker, as we prepare to enter the last decade of the 20th century, it gives me great pleasure to recognize an institution which has shaped this country for the last two centuries, and hopefully for many more to come.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is particularly fitting that the institution of the black church in America is the focus of this year's celebration of Black History Month. I'm pleased to join my colleagues talking about this subject today for two reasons. First to celebrate the role that these organizations play in the life of African-Americans in the 17th District in Michigan and throughout the United States; but also because their activities and influence have extended throughout the length and breadth of American life.

It is striking how much of the commentary about the black church by the noted historian and social critic W.E.B. DuBois is still true today. Many of DuBois' insights into the role of the church in the black community in Philadelphia in 1899 would not sound amiss to contemporary residents of large metropolitan areas, such as my home in Detroit. "All movements for social betterment are apt to center in the churches," DuBois wrote.

The church acted as a social, political, and moral center of the black community. Moreover, individual congregations also served as incubators of such other community institutions as schools, newspapers, and benevolent societies. Today we would only add more examples, such as drug treatment programs, child day care centers, shelters for the homeless, and community food assistance programs.

More recently, in the present generation, we are well aware of the role that black church leaders and their congregations have played in the ongoing struggle for equal rights and justice in America. Because it was the first institution that African-Americans themselves controlled, it is not surprising that the black church has served the larger community as a training ground for leadership in public affairs. Today the social and political activism of leaders like Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and others is being carried on in city halls around the country, as well as on the floor of the House in the person of several of my distinguished colleagues.

But it is not only the people in the pulpits that we should celebrate today, but those in the congregation too. It has been my privilege on many occasions to attend church services and witness the key role performed by the church in the spiritual life of black Americans. I have felt uplifted by the atmosphere of faith and hope which have survived and overcome all kinds of obstacles and challenges. Religion among black Americans speaks today with many different voices, but it continues to set high standards for the community at large. Our job in the Congress is to see that America lives up to those expectations.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, black churches have traditionally represented a powerful force for change and creativity. It is with this in mind that I reflect upon the myriad of contributions made by Afro-American churches in the United States in general, and in my home State of Illinois, in particular.

The black church in America, from the pre-Civil War days until the present, has performed numerous functions for its members, not limited to religious teachings. In Illinois, the black church has provided not only spiritual leadership, but also a center for cultural, social, and political activity. The monumental power of black churches is demonstrated by the fact that the church's influence spans in both scope and time. Clearly, the influence of black churches in this country has been all-encompassing.

A major contribution of the black church has been providing social functions for its members. From the early 20th century to the present, the church has striven to meet the needs of people. One aspect of this role is providing a gathering place where social activity can take place, a function important where segregation limited social opportunities.

Other forms of social functions have included providing for its members services which need to be met. As early as 1919, Dr. L.K. Williams of the Olivet Baptist Church in Chicago established an organization to deal with the ever-changing needs of the burgeoning black population. Other churches have also sought to provide services with complex problems in diverse areas such as labor relations, housing, child-care, and recreation. I am pleased to honor an institution which has sought to provide solutions and individual assistance for those facing burdensome tasks and seemingly insurmountable problems.

Besides contributing to the well-being of individuals and families through social programs, I also wish to recognize the black church for its contributions to American culture. Styles of music such as gospel and jazz, which have roots in black religion, possess a universal quality. This music is entertaining and uplifting to all Americans. In addition, it provides a source of creative inspiration to artists and musicians of every genre. Clearly, in this way too, the black church has been influential in shaping American life.

Black churches have also played a tremendous role in ridding our Nation of evil, during our most shameful era of black enslavement. During the time of slavery, religion gave the slaves the necessary resources for rebellion. Through their religion, slaves were inspired to strive for freedom and equality. It was through religion that black slaves learned the means of achieving these ends—protest and action. Often, black churches actively and deliberately worked to counter the wrongdoings of those in power. I am proud that in Illinois such actions were exhibited by the black churches which participated in the Underground Railroad during the Civil War days.

In the last three decades, the black church has continued its involvement in the struggle for freedom and equality for blacks. With the encouragement of the church and its leaders, blacks found the courage and desire to march for freedom on the streets of Selma, AL, to ride in the front of the bus in the deep South, and to protest the numerous other forms of discrimination which they were forced to endure only because of their skin color.

Since the early days of this Republic and the great State of Illinois, the black churches have been instrumental in moving the cause of freedom forward, enhancing American culture, and providing assistance to individuals in need. In the eloquent words of Sir Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton, the church often provided a "core of meaningful activity, [and] a stable point of orientation, amid the complexities of the urban world." These churches and their leaders have been a great asset to this Nation, and will, no doubt, continue this legacy of fighting for liberty and enriching American society in the decades to come.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this special order to mark February as Black History Month. During this month, the struggles, accomplishments, and contributions of black Americans are made known throughout the Nation. The history of black Americans must never be overlooked, for black Americans are an integral part of American history.

Black History Month is a time to make a concentrated effort to educate the Nation about the important contributions made by black Americans. The contributions of black Americans to American culture, past and present, can be noted in every field and endeavor. Well known are the accomplishments of George Washington Carver in agriculture; Martin Luther King, Jr., in civil rights; Dr. Charles Drew in medicine; and Ida B. Wells in journalism. Their achievements have added to the fabric that makes up America.

However, when we speak of the accomplishments of black Americans, we must also take a broader look at their history and culture. A central element is the black church—the institution through which integrity and strength have been instilled and nurtured in the hearts and minds of many outstanding Americans. It is for this reason that the theme of this year's Black History Month is the black church.

The role of the black church in the black community can never be overstated. From as far back to the days of slavery to the beginning of the civil rights movement, and to the present, the black church has been the pillar of the black community, providing moral strength and guidance, social bonds and civic awareness.

Providing moral strength and guidance is one of the principal roles of the black church. Guiding and soothing individuals in emotional distress, planting the seeds of self-awareness and knowledge in the minds of black youth, and aiding those who cannot aid themselves, has always been a foremost function of the black church.

The church offers an environment which is conducive to learning. Within its walls is a warmth where black Americans share ideas, speak of current issues and ultimately gain more insight and knowledge of themselves. Also, the church sponsors activities in the community which provide learning experiences for all those who wish to get involved.

The black church fosters within the community self-esteem, self-respect and self-awareness. Without these, the cause to elevate black American status would be lost.

During this Black History Month, let us once again be reminded that the church has been a beacon of hope, an elixir of truth, and a monumental power in the lives of black Americans. In the past as well as the present, the strength of black Americans has paralleled the strength of the black church. In the future, the black church will continue its special role bringing hope, strength, and leadership to black Americans.

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is quite befitting today that we in the Congress recognize the black church in America as the cornerstone of the black community. Sixty-five years ago W.E.B. Dubois, a noted black scholar and master of political thought, addressed the issue of the intrinsic relationship between blacks, particularly those in America—the church and religion. His intent was to dispel the notion that religion was acquired by black people, whose origin dates back to Africa, through missionaries.

Dr. Dubois stated:

> Religion in the United States was not simply brought to blacks by missionaries. To treat it that way is to miss the essence of the black action and reaction upon American religion. We must think of the black as transplanting to the United States a certain spiritual entity and an unbreakable set of old-world beliefs, manners, superstitions, and religious observances. * * * a philosophy of life.

For over 200 years the black church has been the primary identification for blacks both spiritually and politically. Dually, it is an important force in the survival and growth of black culture.

Mr. Speaker, this church that we speak of, in the historical context, has spawned some of the greatest leaders of the 20th century. And though this institution has been despised by the foot soldiers of racism and even men of the cloth—tainted by critics as crude and naive—the black church has and will continue to survive.

Let it be known that the black church has played an integral role in the development and advancement of American society. Henry H. Mitchell, who is recognized for his writings on this institution enlightens us on the point that:

It is important to remember that there is a distinct black religious experience today because there was and is a distinct black experience in America—and because that experience was given religious interpretation by men, most of who were ignorant of the white tradition. Their interpretations were made on the basis of their African background and peculiar experience in America—as this experience could be articulated with their knowledge of the Bible. The theological world has therefore, a fresh datumn of experience far more free.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Congressional Black Caucus and of this distinguished body I am honored to observe February as Black History Month and to acknowledge the significance of the black church.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, February is a month in which we celebrate President's birthdays and honor St. Valentine. But the month of February has taken on a special meaning for many in the Nation. In 1985, Congress passed a resolution declaring February as Black History Month. So along with honoring two Presidents who committed themselves to making our country great, we take the time to observe the vitally important contributions black Americans have made to this great Nation.

The spirit and determination of black Americans is evident throughout this Nation's history. During the civil rights movement in the 1960's, many emerged as heroes and heroines in the cause of freedom. But to understand the source of strength that gave spirit to this just cause, it is necessary to look to the institution which the black community in the Nation would turn to over and over again, the black church. Its structures were used for meetings, freedom schools, voter registration drives and community centers. Its members were often the foundation upon which local movement were built and sustained. The black church provided an anchor to black Americans during times of social and political strife.

In the wake of underclass family disintegration, the black church has made its facilities available to programs that respond to the needs of the community. The Lincoln Congregational Temple right here in the Nation's Capital for example, started an Adopt a Family Program. Under this program, troubled families can sign up to be matched with sponsors who provide support for a year. People from all walks of life have benefited from the program.

The Congress of National Black Churches, in targeting a problem that has penetrated all social strata, operates Project Spirit. Project Spirit is an afterschool program for children, many of whom don't have a parent waiting at home for them. The children are picked up at school and taken to the church. After a snack and a pause for prayer and songs, the children spend an hour on homework. Then activities begin which range from black history lessons to role-playing games to help them work out conflicts. These programs are operating successfully in Oakland, Atlanta, and Indianapolis. Three hundred more churches around the country are asking for help to implement Project Spirit.

But with all this help, all this determination and good will there is a force working against the best efforts of the church. It is an insidious, deadly force. It is made up of drug dealers and the drugs they push. There is a segment of society within the black population that has been most affected by the infiltration of drugs in our society. It is the segment of young men in the prime of life, who have become heavily involved in drug abuse, the sale and purchase of drugs as well as the terrible violence that comes with the business. I read in a Washington Post article that black men between the ages of 18 and 21 are being threatened with virtual extinction. Community leaders in black neighborhoods say that the biggest problem they face is finding a way to help yound black men from being drawn into lives of drug abuse and crime and finding a way to pull those who are involved, out. The statistics on black men's health risks, incarceration, homicide and drug abuse are shocking and reveal a tragic aspect of society. Our society, for the most part, has failed to adequately respond to this tragedy. But the black church is reaching out to these young men.

In New Orleans, 20 adolescent boys at the Greater Liberty Baptist Church joined the church brotherhood for a Black Manhood Training Program. This program offers discussions on spirituality, health, the importance of education and the special problems of black men. One exercise, for example, was to analyze the reasons behind a widely held perception that black men are not responsible fathers. Black churches are identifying the social problems which plague black communities. But many of these problems have now become cyclical. For many people there is no way out. There is no hope. But we cannot walk away from these problems. We all have to contribute to working out solutions.

I praise black churches for the role they have played in aiding, comforting, and educating their congregations. Black churches have been a place where the political and social needs of the community could find collective expression. I commend these institutions for their tireless work in teaching people that there is hope and that it is possible to beat even the most formidable odds.

I would also, at this time, like to praise someone very special who played an integral part years ago in leading black people down the road to freedom. In 1820, Harriet Tubman, who was born in my district in Maryland, was also born into slavery. She fought extreme adversity her entire life. But her triumphs would inspire those who knew her and those who would engage in civil rights battle years later. She was called the Moses of her people as she helped many of them flee from slavery after she herself escaped to freedom. She traveled back down into the South, risking her life time and again, so others would find their way to freedom.

I would like to take this moment to express my pride in having such a distinguished and heroic figure in history come from a little place called Bucktown on the Eastern Shore in Maryland. I proudly salute Harriet Tubman for her courage and wisdom and for the hope and inspiration she gave her people and this Nation.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to participate in the special order honoring Black History Month. My distinguished colleagues Representatives STOKES and DELLUMS indicate that the theme of Black History Month this year is the role of Afro-American churches. Because of all they have accomplished and all they have contributed, this is a very appropriate theme.

Today, churches are an enormously important institution in America's black community. They are a great source of spiritual, social, and moral sustenance for millions of African-Americans. It is no accident that some of the most respected and influential African-American leaders today and in the recent past—Benjamin Hooks, Bill Gray, Adam Clayton Powell, Jesse Jackson, Andrew Young, and above all Martin Luther King, Jr.—had their roots in the African-American church.

This is the occasion to recall that the special role of the African-American church is not new. Indeed, it has a long and rich history that should not be forgotten.

By the early 1800's, the institution of the black church was coming into its own, attending to the religious needs of slaves in the South and free blacks in the North. As one writer explained years afterward:

The church service was one of the few occasions when slaves were allowed to congregate, when they could feel a spiritual union with other Negroes, when they could feel that they were equal to the white man—in the eyes of God—and when they could see one of their own number, the preacher, rise above the dead level of slavehood.

It is little wonder that under the unspeakably horrible conditions of slavery, the church was a source of liberty and dignity. We know that there were black ministers who fought for freedom for their people against all odds. In the South, perhaps the greatest was Rev. Nat Turner, who led a rebellion of slaves in 1831. And in the North, numerous black churches showed great courage by serving as stations on the "Underground Railroad," which helped slaves escape to freedom.

After the Civil War, when African-Americans won a precarious freedom, the church continued for decades to stand as a spiritual and social refuge. An account from the early 1940's noted that black churches—are of importance to the power relations within the Negro community and between Negroes and whites. They bring Negroes together for a common cause. They train them for concerted action. They provide an organized followership for Negro leaders . . . These institutions sometimes take action themselves in the power field, attempting to improve the Negro's lot of voicing the Negro protest. Even more, they provide the means by which Negro leaders and organizations, which are more directly concerned with power problems, can reach the Negro people.

That was written before the advent of the civil rights movement, one of the greatest and noblest chapters in our Nation's history, and it helps explain the leading role of the African-American church in the movement. Indeed, when historians look back at it, when they sort out the strands of its fabric—A. Philip Randolph and his fellow union activists, Thurgood Marshall and his legal colleagues, Bayard Rustin and the other pioneers of nonviolent resistance, John Lewis and the idealistic students he led, Rosa Parks and all the other ordinary people who showed extraordinary courage—the historians will write that no strand was stronger, no strand was more reliable, no strand endured more external stress, no strand was more crucial to the survival and integrity of the fabric than the African-American church.

Because of all that the African-American church has accomplished and continues to accomplish, we celebrate and remember it today.

Mr. HATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, in honor of Black History Month to commemorate the life of an outstanding American, a native son of my congressional district, Henry Ossian Flipper.

Flipper bears the distinction of being the first black man to graduate from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

He was born a slave in 1856 in Thomasville, GA. He attended Atlanta University before he was nominated to the Academy by Georgia Congressman James C. Freeman.

While at the Academy, he was silenced by his classmates. In his autobiography "The Colored Cadet at West Point," Flipper stated that he endured harassment and ostracization on a daily basis. Despite such circumstances, he stood firm and resilient in the face of adversity and graduated in 1877, 50th in a class of 76.

After graduation he was commissioned as 2d lieutenant in the 10th Calvary. He led the unit in Texas and Oklahoma during the Indian War. Unfortunately, Flipper's military career was cut short due to accusations of embezzlement. Although he was acquitted of the embezzlement charges, he was dishonorably discharged from the Army in 1882.

Flipper did not let his discharge deter him from serving his country. His civilian career reads like an impressive resume of achievement and public service. He was an accomplished engineer, writer, surveyor, scholar, and translator. He worked as a consultant with the Justice Department and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He served as assistant to the Secretary of the Interior where he was responsible for the planning and construction of the Alaskan railroad system.

He served as chief engineer and legal consultant to several American mining and oil companies in Mexico, the Caribbean, and South America. Fluent in both French and Spanish, he translated land claims and technical texts on engineering and mining laws of the Southwest. Flipper was the first black man to be an editor of an all white newspaper, the Nogales Sunday Herald in Arizona. He also authored several books, historical articles, and he edited a set of books on the mining laws of Mexico. In the latter part of his life, Flipper taught physics at Morris Brown College in Atlanta, GA.

In 1976, the Army conducted a full review of Flipper's court-martial proceedings. He was posthumously granted an honorable discharge. In 1978 his remains were reinterred with full military honors at his birthplace.

Flipper died in 1940 in Atlanta at the age of 84.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, in observance of the commemoration of Black History Month, I would like to say that it is an honor to say now a few words about black history in my congressional district. My district is called by Floridians Florida's First Coast because it was in this area that Ponce de Leon discovered the mainland of what is now the United States. And the area was first in many other ways, some concerning the coming of black people to what is now the United States. For we are told that in 1564 when the French Huguenots settled in what is now Jacksonville, among them were a number of Africans who came in this beginning settlement of our country. So these were there in my district at the very beginning. They were not slaves.

Another historic event among black people was in the Battle of Alligator Bridge in 1778 when hundreds of black patriot soldiers came to fight the British in Florida. Their principal encounter was at Alligator Bridge in my congressional district. And an unnamed black soldier gave his life in that battle.

Great black people have lived in Jacksonville, including A. Philip Randolph, whose birthday is now being celebrated by the Postal Service by a postage stamp. Another great black person is Mary McLeod Bethune, for whom an exquisite park has been established in Washington, DC. Contemporary in time were the Johnson brothers, one who was James Weldon Johnson, the U.S. diplomatic official and literary genius who collaborated with his brother in the production of many musical productions in our national heritage.

More recently, in the last decade, the United States has honored the outstanding volunteers in America; and on two occasions those selected were black ladies in their ninth decade of life. Currently Mrs. Arnolta Williams, was the honoree this year, and about 10 years ago, the national honoree was my very dear friend, Dr. Eartha White, who passed away at the age of 98. She was especially honored at the White House by a Presidential reception. This is modern history; two wonderful black ladies, both from Jacksonville and both in their ninth decade, each chosen as the single most outstanding volunteer of the United States for their particular years of recognition. Certainly, Jacksonville is proud of these and other black people who have made our country a beautiful one. Their lives are a part of our heritage and for this I am truly grateful, as are all of my constituents.

Before I close, I would like to point out that Congressman GEORGE CROCKETT is a part of Jacksonville. He was born there and grew up there. Jacksonville is proud of that fact. We all acknowledge him, an important part of modern black history. I am grateful to him for his many kindnesses to me personally.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, we join together today to celebrate the cultural, political, economic and social contributions of black Americans. Black History Month compels us to spend a moment in time to appreciate these significant and varied achievements that have helped make this Nation richer spiritually, intellectually, and artistically.

Black people have made a positive and dramatic impact upon all aspects of our society. Whether we consider the contributions of prerevolutionary merchants and traders, or the dynamism of the Alvin Ailey dance troupe; whether we consider the contributions of such eminent individuals as George Washington Carver or the grit and determination of the black GI; or whether we consider the gift of a literature given us by a Langston Hughes a Toni Morrison, a Gloria Naylor or the courageous political leadership of a Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., we see all around us the living, breathing tapestry of black life in America and its tremendous contributions to the betterment of our Nation.

And yet, black people have had to offer their contributions against the backdrop of seemingly implacable and often de jure discrimination. Indeed, when the U.S. Constitution was finally ratified 200 years ago it stipulated that black Americans were to be considered only three-fifths the equal of whites, and then only for the purposes of taxation and representation. Two hundred years later, after a bloody civil war, the ratification of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, and the passage of numerous civil rights laws, black Americans remain less than full and equal citizens in the land of their birth.

Economically, too often denied equal job opportunities in the labor force, their average annual income is only three-fifths that of white wage-earners, hauntingly similar to that earlier proclamation. Socially, they are still denied open and fair access to both ownership and rental housing in many sections of this country. Politically, black Americans remain underrepresented at all levels of Government. For all these reasons and more they are forced to live the daily agony of a dream too-long deferred.

No one person or group can rectify this history of injustice. Conversely, we cannot allow the past to paralyze us into apathy and despair, because too many people have struggled and died to make a better tomorrow for all black Americans—and for all America.

We owe much to those who came before us in this struggle. We owe them a legacy of our continued commitment to turn back injustice and oppression. Black History Month is a fitting time to remember, and to dedicate ourselves anew, through collective action and personal example, to this struggle in our homes, our churches, our classrooms, and our workplace.

We have many heroines and heroes to look to as role models in the struggle for true freedom and equality. Outstanding Americans, such as Harriet Tubman, Fannie Lou Hamer, and Marian Wright Edelman, as well as Crispus Attucks, Frederick Douglass, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. have each called this Nation to higher ideals. It was Frederick Douglass who, in May 1863, called for complete assimilation of American blacks into the political mainstream, because this represented "the only solid and final solutions" to the question of full emancipation. Douglass went on to say: "Save the Negro and you save the Nation, destroy the Negro and you destroy the Nation."

Dr. King especially called upon the U.S. Government to live up to the principles professed in the Declaration of Independence—that all are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Throughout his adult life, right to the very moment of his murder on April 4, 1968, Dr. King challenged the conscience of America by confronting church, school and State on the spiritual, intellectual and political immorality of racism, segregation and economic injustice in our society.

Sadly, the dreams and hopes of both Frederick Douglass and Dr. King have yet to be realized. Thus in 1989 both the Bush administration and the 101st Congress face formidable challenges in reassessing and redefining national priorities to resolve the social and economic disasters spawned by the previous administration and generations of neglect and hostility to the impoverished and the nonmajority in our society. Foremost among these disasters in an intensifying internal conflict on the bases of race and class, a conflict further intensified by the plague of drugs and the culture of violence that permeates so many sectors of our society. We in the Congress have a major, moral responsibility to redefine these national priorities, so that our black youth can have the hope of expanded opportunity, rather than the nihilistic despair of current realities, as their guiding star in the years ahead.

But, in looking to present and future challenges, let us neither neglect nor forget those valiant men and women in every walk of life—from slavery to freedom—those efforts have brought us this far. Let us cherish their memory. Let us learn from their mistakes as well as their accomplishments, so that we can hasten the day when all God's children will be free at least, free at least, to live in peace.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today, Black History Month draws to a close and I am happy to take this opportunity to applaud the continued emphasis and celebration of this very important tradition. I recall with great interest and satisfaction that Dr. Carter Godwin Woodson, universally regarded as the Father of Black History, started in 1926 what was then called Negro History Week.

This national observance was extended in 1976 to a 1-month-long-observance by the National Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History [ASALH] which Dr. Woodson founded in Chicago, IL, in 1915.

It is highly fitting, given the fact that so many of our political and economic leaders and entertainers have had their genesis in the black church that the national theme this year is "The Role of Afro-American Churches in Economic, Political, and Social Development at Home and Abroad."

It is equally fitting that the theme celebrates and gives much needed and deserved attention to the one institution in our national life that black people have historically controlled and utilized as a power base and beacon for uplift, reconciliation, and spiritual enhancement.

I am personally pleased to give witness to the marvelous achievements unparalleled in human history, that over 40 million black Americans have soared to the heights. They have achieved, in the face of fearsome and formidable odds, an extraordinary record of accomplishments. These achievements must be celebrated and told over and over again extending far beyond a 1-month celebration.

The remarkable history of black Americans, in fact, is a history that must be told day by day and year by year in order to provide a comprehensive and factual understanding; particularly, after centuries of neglect.

I pause to salute our extraordinary black precursors, with keen satisfaction and personal pride, and for those of us in the present who must be the bearers of the torch and who must pass the record on to our treasured posterity.

In closing, I say in the spirit of an ancient and revered language in Swahili to my fellow black Americans over the length of this land you are watu wazuri—a beautiful people.

Mr. TANNER. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to take part in this special order called to commemorate Black History Month. It is appropriate that all of us take a few moments to observe this special commemorative period in which our Nation pauses to recognize the enormous contribution made by black Americans.

I feel especially privileged to represent the Eighth Congressional District of Tennessee. My district includes the hometowns of many contemporary black Americans who are widely known throughout this Nation for the achievements they have attained, ranging from literacy excellence to outstanding performances in sports and entertainment.

Alex Haley, the author of "Roots" grew up in Henning, TN in Lauderdale County. Ed Jones, the outstanding defensive player for the Dallas Cowboys was raised in Jackson, TN. From a humble beginning in the community of Nutbush in Haywood County came rock star Tina Turner. While I am deeply proud of the achievements of these celebrity constituents, I am certain that most congressional districts in this Nation can lay claim to similar constituents.

There can be no question about the example these particular Americans have been to young people in my district and throughout our country. However, in commemorating Black History Month in 1989, I feel it is equally important to recognize others who have struggled quietly, out of the focus of spotlights, to set an example for others by devoting their lives to providing a helping hand and an active voice to those in their communities who had no hope.

Foremost among the quiet heroes in black communities are the churches. Like most parts of the country there are several denominations of black churches in the Eighth District of Tennessee. Most prominent are Baptists and the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church. My district includes the mother church of the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church in Jackson, TN. Furthermore, Lane College, also located in Jackson, has been affiliated throughout its history with the C.M.E.

We can hold up the accomplishments of individual black Americans as examples for others to follow, but the significance of the church and her affiliated educational institutions cannot be overlooked. Together, with the deep commitment of their leaders, those institutions have, throughout their history, provided their congregations and their students with a practical vehicle that engendered hope when there was none and that offered opportunity to obtain skills when there was no other institution available for black Americans to get them.

Mr. Speaker, I could speak for many hours on specific individuals whose talents either supported those institutions or were energized by them. The late C.A. Rawls of Brownsville, TN, for example, was denied the right to vote until 1961, but did not let that hinder his effort to build successful businesses that he used to offer a helping hand to others less fortunate.

Emmett Ballard, a West Tennessee attorney, used his skill and standing in the legal profession to further the cause of civil rights.

That list can go on and on. The point is that these people played an important role in building their community—overcoming racial barriers, even when those barriers seemed impregnable, trying to offer a better life to others and setting an example that all Americans, regardless of race, could follow.

I appreciate my colleagues Congressmen LOUIS STOKES and RON DELLUMS reserving time for this body to pay special attention to Black History Month.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, the month of February is set aside as Black History Month. Back in 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson established a special period of time in February to recognize the heritage, achievements and contributions of black Americans. Dr. Woodson is recognized as the father of black history. Since that time, February has taken a new significance in the lives of many Americans of all races.

The National Black History Month theme for 1989 is "The Role of Afro-American Churches in Economic, Political, and Social Development at Home and Abroad." I think this focus on the church is a timely and wise choice. The black churches in the Third District of Georgia, which I have the honor of representing, have had a tremendous impact on the life and culture of many of my constituents. These churches have helped to affirmatively shape the history of the Third District and will help Georgia, and the rest of the Nation, to progress into the future.

Black churches have played a tremendous role in the development of America—particularly black America. Black churches and religious faith gave hope to blacks throughout our country's history. Religious faith gave hope to the blacks who were unfortunately captured or born into slavery. It gave those courageous people the faith that allowed them to realize that, while they were shackled in this world, they could be eternally free in God's world. This religious faith convinced those slaves who could not vote that all men were God's children and all men were equal. This faith showed those slaves, whose families were routinely separated and broken up, that all men were brothers and there is only one family of people on this Earth.

After the Civil War, the black churches helped take those recently freed Americans and shape them into participants in democracy. The churches helped register voters, helped freed people find paying jobs, helped educate the uneducated, and helped bring hope and faith to the hopeless and faithless. The black churches were vital in helping these black Americans become a crucial link in our Nation's development and future.

Martin Luther King, Jr., in his extraordinary 1963 speech in Washington, focused on the faith that came from his dream of equality and justice. He said, "with this faith we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day." The faith that has come, and will continue to come, from the black churches has carried and built on this dream.

Reverend King is just one example of a black leader that had his roots in the church. He, and others from the churches, became leaders in the difficult struggle for civil rights. They had been nurtured in these black churches and had a special sense of justice and a special relationship with the parishioners. This combination, combining a thrust for great social change with a fundamental anchor in religious morals, allowed leaders such as King to attract people of all races to the civil rights movement.

The black churches have continued to be a major force in the betterment of black Americans and the United States. They have played a large role in getting people registered and voting. The churches have convinced their members that changes are best sought through the political process. The churches have continued to educate the illiterate and counsel unwed mothers. The black churches have helped in the feeding and sheltering of our Nation's homeless. The black churches have also done a great deal in the war on drugs. They have sponsored "Say No To Drugs" campaigns and have told our young people of the horror of drugs and addiction. Additionally, the churches have fought crime in the streets and neighborhoods through organized neighborhood programs and watches.

One black church that has been such an innovator of humanitarian ideas is the Fourth Street Baptist Church in Columbus, GA, with its pastor, the Reverend Johnny H. Flakes, Jr. I have had the privilege of knowing the Fourth Street Baptist Church and Reverend Flakes for many years. Some of you may remember Reverend Flakes from when he gave the opening invocation to this body some time ago. The Fourth Street Baptist Church under Reverend Flakes has had a significant influence on the Third District of Georgia because of its hard work and dedication, exemplified by such efforts as organizing a food program called Loving Action which provides hundreds of meals to area residents each day.

Black churches, such as the Fourth Street Baptist Church, will continue to be a focal point of black development. The heroic deeds these churches have done in the past will no doubt be matched in the future. There is much to be done to keep America on track as the best nation ever envisioned by man. We must demand and expect equality, justice and freedom for all. Black churches can help us achieve this goal.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, the month of February has long been established as National Black History Month so that we may honor the many outstanding contributions to this country by its Afro-American citizens. This year we focus on the Afro-American Church and its important role in the black experience. In keeping with the theme I would like to pay tribute to a very special church in the 22d Congressional District of Pennsylvania. For the last 170 years the St. Paul African Methodist Episcopal Church of Washington, PA, has been a beacon for its devoted membership and the entire community.

The history of the African Methodist Church has its beginnings in the city of Philadelphia, PA, in the year 1816. The founder of this great connection was Richard Allen who for almost 30 years had sought to create a church which embodied the teachings and principles of the Methodist religion in which he had been schooled, but one which also recognized the strong and proud African heritage of the members.

In 1818, just 2 short years following the church's historical beginnings in the city of Philadelphia, a sister church was formed on the foundation that Richard Allen had laid. Across the State in the city of Washington, the St. Paul African Methodist Episcopal Church was born, which today makes it one of the oldest standing congregations west of the Allegheny Mountains.

Since its beginning, St. Paul A.M.E. Church has regularly been involved in the advancement of racial and cultural consciousness in the community. With some families claiming four and five generations of members in the church, they have been able to foster the traditions and history of its African-American heritage. Over the years the church has offered support to people of all races, and has been a force of positive movement and change in our area.

Today, 171 years after its inception, the church continues to be a leader in the community.

As we acknowledge the contributions of the church in the Afro-American experience, I know that my colleagues will join me in paying tribute to St. Paul African Methodist Episcopal Church of Washington, PA, in its small but nonetheless important role in American history.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in commemoration of Black History Month. Specifically, the economic, political, and social role of the Afro-American Church in the lives of black Americans. Without the foresight and perseverance of Carter G. Woodson, we might not be standing here today commemorating the historical achievements of black Americans.

It is without question or debate that black Americans have played a tremendous role in the growth and development of our Nation, contributing in all aspects of our culture, from science to literature, from religion to politics.

The Afro-American Church has stood behind black America from the Civil War to the civil rights struggles of the 1950's and 1960's and even today—vigilant and steadfast.

So let the word go forth from the Chamber of this body, that in the spirit we commemorate Black History Month, we stand and seek to recognize the rights and accomplishments of all Americans.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, as you know, during the entire month of February our Nation celebrates Black History Month. This occasion affords all Americans the opportunity to pay tribute to black Americans whose struggles, sacrifices and achievements have helped to build this great Nation. Earlier today in this Chamber, my colleagues delivered eloquent statements on the importance of Black History Month.

Historians and writers regard Black History Month as a time to examine not only the achievements of notable black Americans, but to measure the progress of our Nation in achieving its goal of equality for all Americans.

I am pleased to share with my colleagues four articles of particular interest. In the first article which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the author, Brian E. Albrecht, examines the Underground Railroad and its place in American history. The second article from the Los Angeles Times explains the relationship of slave-era dwellings to the day-to-day lives of slaves. In the third article, "Negro League Stars Stand the Test of Time," the authors pay tribute to the outstanding contributions of black Americans to the sport of baseball. Finally, in an article from the Los Angeles Times, the author, Lee May, uses Black History Month as a time to explore the charges of racism affecting affluent blacks in today's society. I hope my colleagues will take the time to examine these articles. They provide interesting and enlightening reading.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in celebrating Black History Month. It provides a unique opportunity for all Americans to reflect upon the struggle for freedom in our Nation; to appreciate the indomitability of the human spirit; and to renew our commitment to the goals of a fairer and more just society.

[From the Cleveland (OH) Plain Dealer, Feb. 19, 1989]

UNDERGROUND RAILROAD HISTORY WAS WHITE-WASHED—SLAVES ENGINEERED ROAD TO FREEDOM

(By Brian E. Albrecht)

Trapped at the river, they could hear the baying of bloodthirsty hounds; almost feel the cruel bite of the whip and cold steel weight of shackles once again.

Somewhere in Ohio on a cold snowy night, a family of runaway slaves huddles in the face of certain doom.

Suddenly through the gloom comes a light, a beacon of freedom, and just as the jaws of oppression are about to snap, the family is whisked aboard the Underground Railroad. During the next few days they will be shuttled through a tightly organized, highly secretive network of shelters hidden behind false walls in homes, barns and businesses of sympathetic whites.

Using vigilance, guile and daring, special "conductors" will punch the family's ticket to the Promised Land along invisible rails of good will.

According to some historians, it's a story that has been passed down since before the Civil War, a story embellished with drama and excitement with each retelling, a story popularized in textbooks and fiction.

But they also say parts of it are sheer myth.

Ohio plays a significant role in both the reality and the myths of the Underground Railroad.

Its geographical location as a "free" state (where slavery was prohibited) lying between slave states to the south and freedom to the north in Canada, plus a strong and often organized antislavery sentiment in the state, made Ohio a natural conduit for fugitive slaves.

Legend has it that the term "Underground Railroad" was coined by a slave owner pursuing a fugitive into Ohio. The owner lost his quarry in a chase across the Ohio River and supposedly remarked that the man "must have gone off on an underground road."

Many of the most colorful personalities and places of the antislavery movement had Ohio connections. Eliza Harris, the slave woman who crossed the Ohio River, jumping on drifting ice floes with her child in her arms, was immortalized in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" by Harriet Beecher Stowe. The author was born and raised in a house in Cincinnati that was used to shelter runaway slaves. John Brown—whose ill-fated 1838 raid on a federal arsenal to secure arms for an envisioned slave rebellion led to his hanging and martyrdom—was a longtime resident of Ohio with family ties to Hudson and Akron.

Ohio cities such as Cincinnati, Oberlin and Salem became nationally renowned for their support of fugitive slaves.

In Cincinnati, banker Levi Coffin and other antislavery sympathizers organized a system of assistance for runaway slaves, offering shelter, transportation, clothing and other necessities. Coffin's efforts earned him the title of president of the Underground Railroad (a title shared at various times by other antislavery leaders).

From its founding in 1833, Oberlin College openly accepted black students and the town became a popular destination for runaway slaves. The locale made national headlines in 1858 when slave hunters captured an escaped fugitive who had settled in Oberlin, and took him to Wellington for transport South. Several hundred abolitionists from Oberlin and Wellington stormed the hotel where the former slave was being kept, and carried him off to safety. Some of the rescuers were charged with violating the federal Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 (which prohibited interference with a slave owner's attempts to reclaim his "property"). All charges and sentences imposed against the rescuers were later dropped or reduced.

Similar rescue attempts were made in cities across Ohio, but weren't always as successful. In 1856, when a family of escaped slaves was tracked to Cincinnati, one woman went berserk during the ensuing arrest by federal authorities, vowing that she would slay her own children before they'd go back to slavery. She then seized a butcher knife and killed her 10-year-old daughter. The local citizenry was so incensed that it took an escort of 500 deputies to return the family to Kentucky.

Cleveland had the distinction of sending one of the last fugitive slaves back to the South before the Civil War when Sara Lucy Bagby was traced here by her former owner and arrested in 1861. Deputies were attacked by groups of black Clevelanders and forced to use clubs on the mob to get their prisoner to court. A second rescue attempt failed as she was being transported south by train.

Several communities in Southern Ohio, due to their proximity to the Ohio River, became particularly well-known for offering aid to runaway slaves. The house of famed abolitionist John Rankin, a Presbyterian minister who used signal lights to guide runaways, still stands near Ripley. Towns in the area bear such names as Getaway and Aid, reflecting their contribution to the antislavery cause.

But according to some historians, from this bedrock of fact was built a few of the myths associated with the Underground Railroad.

"Although the Underground Railroad was a reality, much of the material relating to it belongs in the realm of folklore rather than history."

Such was the challenge posed by Larry Gara in his 1961 book "The Liberty Line" in examining what he described as "one of America's best known but least examined legends."

The current chairman of the history department at Wilmington College in Ohio argued that much of what was known about the Underground Railroad was based on accounts by white abolitionists and railroad participants who greatly exaggerated and romanticized their efforts. (Ohio-related exploits and anecdotes figured prominently in these reminiscences, he added.)

"It would be a little bit like having a total picture of the civil rights movement written from the standpoint of whites who were in it," Gara commented during a recent interview.

In his book, Gara contrasted some of the most glaring myths and realities surrounding the story of the Underground Railroad:

"The abolitionists' accounts tended to neglect the role of the fugitive slaves themselves in the escape drama, give the impression that all successful escapees were passengers on the mysterious line, and implied that the 'railroad' was a nationwide abolitionist organization which operated in secret.

"In reality, it is probably that fugitive slaves succeeded, if at all, mostly by their own efforts. Such help as they received came sometimes from abolitionists, sometimes from other groups, and was often casual and temporary. In the period of the slavery controversy the Underground Railroad was more important as a propaganda device than as an aid to the fleeing slave. Far from being secret, it was copiously and persistently publicized and there is little valid evidence for the existence of a widespread underground conspiracy."

What the railroad was, according to Gara's recent definition, was "loosely, regionally organized effort to help slaves escape or help slaves who had escaped by giving them temporary shelter or providing them with ways of going to Canada. But it wasn't nationally organized."

Gara said that a factor compounding myths surrounding the railroad is the kind of local folklore and hearsay in which every barn that ever harbored a fugitive, or even might have harbored one, and every old structure with a tunnel, false wall or unexplained basement niche suddenly became an Underground Railroad depot. He wrote, "The further removed people are from the Civil War, the more willingly they seem to accept such tradition as fact."

He recently said the cost of such myth-making takes the greatest toll in recognition of both the free blacks in northern states who helped runaway slaves who largely through their own daring and initiative found their way to freedom.

These factors surfaced in his examination of fugitive slave narratives and originally provided Gara with the first inkling that something was amiss. "The more I thought about it, the more I realized that the one big misconception was that the blacks were not participants, that they were just sort of in the background there," he said.

This misconception has been common in the chronicles of American history, according to Gara: "Generally speaking, we tended in the past to make the black community sort of invisible. For years and years we thought of all cowboys as white . . . yet we know there were blacks. They were just made sort of invisible and I think the same thing is true in the history of this.

"Another thing is I don't think people back then even dreamed that these individuals had the ability to carry out such a daring and unusual thing as escaping from slavery. And it was amazing, really."

Since publication of Gara's book, a more realistic picture of the Underground Railroad has found acceptance among historians.

John Hope Franklin, professor of history (emeritus) at Duke University in North Carolina, said the new view is "not a drastic revision. It's more of a modification." Franklin said points raised by Gara "have come to be accepted more and more. This doesn't mean that people like Harriet Tubman (a former slave who returned South several times to aid other escapees) were not involved, but as far as a nationwide organized effort, that was not the case."

Allen Peskin, a professor of history at Cleveland State University, said Gara's points regarding black participation and lack of national organization are "pretty much accepted by professional historians. There are a lot of local amateur historians who like to point to local buildings supposedly used in the Underground Railroad. But most historians accept Gara's approach because it emphasizes more of the black community."

As for textbook revisions, Peskin said changes reflecting this new view are being made, but "slooooowly. It just takes a while. Textbooks usually are a generation behind."

And the public's perception of the Underground Railroad? "You'd be surprised how seldom that subject comes up in normal conversation," Peskin joked. "If asked they'd probably base their response on things half-remembered from school or from what they saw in some sort of docudrama travesty like "Roots."

Dr. Merton L. Dillon, professor of history at Ohio State University, believes Gara "went too far in some areas" in that "he debunked more than should have been debunked," but believes it was done to draw more attention to his argument. "Most revisionists tend to overstate their case."

He added, "There was an Underground Railroad, of course. And most of what we know about it comes from what the white participants told us about it. And yes, they tended to ignore or slight the participation by black people. So Gara has redressed the balance there."

Gara said that since publication of the book, "I'm a little more positive about the white abolitionists, because they did do a terrific job. But again, it's like the civil rights movement. Those whites (in the movement) did a terrific job, too, but if it hadn't been for the black movement it would've been quite different."

Gara is confident his criticism will stand the test of time. He isn't so sure, however, that the popular myth of the Underground Railroad will ever die. "People like legends.

In looking at things they like to keep it very simple, and that's one of the problems."

SLAVES' HOMES EXUDE THE TRUE STORY OF THEIR LIVES

BALTIMORE.—If there's one thing that George W. McDaniel wants people to understand about history, it's that it doesn't happen in books.

"History is not something that happened somewhere else to somebody else. It is happening to all of us. And it's a lively story. Too often, history teachers kill history by making it dull."

It is in this light that McDaniel, a historian specializing in the American South, sees the homes slaves lived in as telling a profound, vibrant story about the way they lived.

In the course of his research, he has studied scores of homes, and conducted just as many interviews with the tenant farmers, servants, descendants of slaves and other families who occupied them. While earning his Ph.D. in history from Duke University in the 1970s, he surveyed a number of slavery-era dwellings in Maryland, including Blair's Purchase, an 18th century site near Baltimore that is considered a rare surviving example of a log cabin slave home.

McDaniel is now director of education and public programs for the Atlanta Historical Society, and is also author of "Hearth and Home," a history of slave and tenant life and housing.

To some, the study of slave housing is a bitter reminder of a time better forgotten. But to scholars such as McDaniel, it is an opportunity to right the historical scales somewhat by providing a real-life look at the point of view of the slave.

"In the past, we have looked too much at the houses of the white leadership, and not at the houses of those who enabled the leaders to live the way they did," says McDaniel. "White or black. You don't see much (research) of the homes of slaves, or white tenant farmers, or yeomen or indentured servant.

"The Rev. (Dr.) Martin Luther King Jr. talked about a people's history giving them a sense of somebody-ness. If you obliterate that history, you do away with their identity."

Blair's Purchase is one of many sites documented by the Maryland Historical Trust's Inventory of Historic Properties. It is estimated to have been built in 1764.

The structure, built as a 1½-story, A-frame log cabin with a dirt floor and no windows has since been added to but still retains many of its original features, including its log frame, stone fireplace and stone-walled cellar. It was built for and occupied by house slaves, but bears more resemblance to descriptions of typical field slave quarters.

In general, says McDaniel, the things found in slave homes give a sense of how slaves carved out their cultural and economic niche in a hostile society—often in ways that drew upon African traditions that they brought across the Atlantic.

"They had their feet on the ground," says McDaniel. "There was a lot of violence, there was continual oppression, but slaves had strategies of making do, and looking out for themselves, that gave them a sense of dignity. And some of that comes out in their houses.

For example, dirt floors, far from being loose and unsanitary, were carefully crafted by slaves to be as smooth and hard as cement—using methods that have been traced to African traditions of mixing and baking clay.

The thatched roofs of many early slave dwellings, as well as the wattle-and-daub wall construction of weaving wicker through a network of wall posts and then plastering it with clay inside and out, are based on African traditions of building.

The existence of concealed cellars, such as those found in slave homes at Monticello, Thomas Jefferson's plantation, suggests their use for hiding things from the slave owner as well as to store medicinal or religious items or food.

Excavation can also tell a great deal about their day-to-day lives. For example, buried fragments of bullets tell us that slaves, either surreptitiously or openly, kept firearms for self-protection or hunting.

Coins provide evidence that slaves participated in the cash market, perhaps by selling fish, vegetables, quilts or other items that they created or obtained on their own.

Fragments of animal bones or shellfish give information about what slaves ate, and how much of their meat was obtained by hunting.

The very existence of slave homes, in fact, as well as the homes of planters and many other whites, is testimony to the expertise of black artisans, says McDaniel.

"Many plantation houses were built by the slaves—not only the labor, but the skilled work as well. The masons, the coopers, the carpenters, the wheelwrights. These were black artisans.

"When we go to Colonial Williamsburg now and see the blacksmiths, they're usually white. But, historically, they would have been black. It's been historically misrepresented."

NEGRO LEAGUE STARS STAND THE TEST OF TIME—GREATS GET RECOGNITION AT LONG LAST

(By Alan Robinson)

PITTSBURGH.—Only the ball was white, the Grays were the dominant team and just about the only green the underpaid players saw was the spotty outfield grass.

But 40 years after the last Negro League World Series, time and fading memories haven't diminished black baseball's impact on America.

"Many people today, especially the young people, don't realize how bad the racism was," said Monte Irvin, one of the first blacks to cross baseball's color line in the late 1940s.

"I was all-state in four sports in New Jersey, but sometimes I couldn't get served at a restaurant two blocks from my high school. There were no job opportunities then. The only thing a black youth could aspire to be was a bellboy or a pullman or an elevator operator, or, maybe, a teacher. There was a time when all we had was black baseball."

Young fans who marvel at Ozzie Smith's wizardry at shortshop, Eric Davis' speed or Darryl Strawberry's power find it hard to believe that not long ago, blacks and dark-skinned Hispanics were relegated to their own leagues, their own hotels, their own sides of town, and, usually, their own fans and own ballfields.

It is inconceivable of Sandy Koufax making the Hall of Fame without facing Willie McCovey, of Johnny Bench never confronting Bob Gibson's fastball. But many of baseball's true legends—Babe Ruth, Cy Young, Honus Wagner, Ty Cobb, Christy Mathewson—played their entire major-league careers without opposing a black player.

"Many of the greatest black athletes of all time played baseball for no money and no recognition," said Irvin, now an assistant in the baseball commissioner's office. "I'm just sorry many major-league fans never got to see them play, because many of them were awesome."

Baseball is now confronting the error of its way and recognizing black ball and its legendary teams and players.

"We must never lose sight of our history, insofar as it is ugly, never to repeat it, and insofar as it is glorious, to cherish it," said National League president and commissioner-elect A. Bartlett Giamatti.

Eleven former Negro League stars and executives—Andrew (Rube) Foster, Oscar Charleston, John Henry (Pop) Lloyd, Josh Gibson, Leroy (Satchel) Paige, Martin Dihigo, William (Judy) Johnson, Walter (Buck) Leonard, James (Cool Papa) Bell, Ray (Hooks) Dandridge and Irvin—have been inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in Coopertown since 1971.

The Pittsburgh Pirates honored six living members of the last Negro League champions, the 1948 Homestead Grays, with a pregame ceremony Sept. 10 and by flying a Grays' pennant atop Three Rivers Stadium for a week.

The former Grays and other former Negro League stars attended a 40th anniversary dinner to swap memories and anecdotes of a forgettable time and unforgettable players.

"I'm glad they are finally getting recognized, because 20 years from now most of them will be gone," Irvin said. "Oh my, there were some players. . . . We had 12 teams, each team had 14 to 17 players and I'd say half of them could have made the majors. Fifty of them could have been Hall of Famers.

"It's too bad baseball couldn't have integrated 15 years sooner (than 1947), because the fans really would have seen the cream of the crop."

The impact of blacks on major league baseball was immediate and indisputable; nine of the 11 National League Most Valuable Players from 1949-59 were black.

Irvin was one of the lucky ones to break the color line after Jackie Robinson and play big-league ball while still young enough to star.

There were others—Roy Campanella, Ernie Banks, Don Newcombe, Larry Doby, Willie Mays (a 17-year-old on the '48 runnerup Birmingham Black Barons)—who peaked in the majors.

But there were dozens who didn't, players whose careers were over by the time visionary Brooklyn Dodgers General Manager Branch Rickey signed Robinson to this historic contract.

Major-league fans never saw Bell, perhaps the fastest player in history; Josh Gibson, a power-hitting catcher who hit the longest homers ever at Yankee Stadium and Forbes Field; Dihigo, so talented he won batting and home run titles and won 256 games as a pitcher; "Smokey" Joe Williams, a half-black, half-Indian power pitcher who was 22-7-1 against major-league teams and was the biggest drawing card of his time.

"If Gibson or Buck Leonard took a team to arbitration today, they'd have to give him part of the team," Irvin said.

Paige, perhaps the greatest pitcher of all time, signed with the Cleveland Indians at age 42, but his "beeball" fastball had been diminished by time and 2,000 starts.

"It's sad that many of these players knew they were good enough to play in the majors . . . that's the one remaining doubt for some of these guys," Irvin said. "Some, like me, were lucky enough to play in the majors before our careers ended. The others will always wonder how good they could have been."

"The only thing I ever wanted to do was hit in the major leagues," said Dandridge, who was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1987. "I just wanted to put my left foot in there, to have been there for only one day, even if it was only for a cup of coffee."

There is no question the Negro National League, based in the East, and the Negro American League, in the Midwest, played quality baseball. John Holway, a black historian, counted 268 black victories in 400 exhibition games against major-league teams and Bell hit .395 in barnstorming tours against white teams.

In an era where a wall of prejudice barred blacks from all professional sports but boxing—Joe Louis was the most revered American of his time by blacks—Negro League teams provided self-respect and a source of identity to black communities.

The Grays, who were originally based in Homestead, a nearby steel town, and the Crawfords made Pittsburgh the center of black baseball. The '35 champion Crawfords' lineup included five Hall of Famers: Gibson, Charleston, Bell, Johnson and Paige. The Grays won nine consecutive Negro League titles from 1937-45 and a total of 10 from 1929-48; the 1931 Grays were 136-17, the 1926 Grays won 43 games in a row.

A black world series was played as early as 1903, but the first organized Negro National League wasn't formed until 1920. The Grays' dominance was challenged by the Pittsburgh Crawfords during the Depression and later by the Kansas City Monarchs.

The black leagues died out shortly after the majors integrated.

"We were supposed to play the Pirates in an exhibition (in 1948), but some of their players came to watch us against the New York Black Yankees," said second baseman Clarence Bruce.

"Buck Leonard hit a home run over the roof in right field, Luke Easter hit one off the facade in right and Bob Thurman hit one over the 447-foot mark. We heard after that the Pirates didn't want to play us."

Life in the black major leagues was never easy. Some teams had two home cities; for years, the Grays played half their games in Washington's Griffith Stadium and often outdrew the Senators. The pay was bad—most players averaged $150 a month, although a star like Gibson commanded $1,000—and the travel was brutal.

Teams played as many as three games a day and seven or eight in a weekend, sometimes in different cities. Their rickety buses were often overloaded and players sometimes stood while riding.

NEGRO LEAGUE STARS STAND THE TEST OF TIME—COOL PAPA GIVES DEVIL HIS DUE

(By Bob Broeg)

When Willie (Devil) Wells died recently, Hall of Famer James (Cool Papa) Bell paid the former shortstop the highest compliment.

"I think so highly of Wells, by far the best shortstop I ever saw, they ought to take me out of the Hall of Fame and put him in," Bell said.

The endorsement for black-league standout Wells, 82, would mean posthumous selection if he scores high enough at the Hall of Fame's Veteran Committee meeting Feb. 28 in Tampa, Fla.

Bell, 84, a ballhawking, base-stealing, switch-hitting center fielder, gained Hall of Fame recognition shortly after the barrier was lifted on black-league players who had been barred from the majors.

The color line was erased in 1947, when Jackie Robinson joined the Brooklyn Dodgers. Hall of Fame recognition was established in 1971, originally for Satchel Paige, who played in the big leagues only after most black stars, including Bell, were too old. Paige helped the Cleveland Indians win the 1948 world championship as a 42-year-old "rookie."

Bell, lean and lanky, remembered his own Mutt-and-Jeff comparison with Wells, who was barely 17 when he joined the old St. Louis Stars in 1924. The shortstop was short, bandy-legged, long-armed with adhesive hands and incredible range, an early-day Ozzie Smith. He was a powerful pull hitter.

At a time when black players played an official season of 80 or so games, Wells had a record 27 home runs in 1929. A year later, he led in doubles (30) and hitting (.404).

Bulldog efforts by a black-league committee of white historians, headed by John B. Holway, a federal worker in Washington, cleared the way for better evaluation of black stars. Holway is the author of a definitive book, "Blackball Stars."

Holway's records show that Wells played professionally for 29 years, through 1953. He played on championship teams in St. Louis in 1928-30-31 before the Stars folded in the Depression. He played also with Detroit, Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Chicago and Newark in black leagues and winters in California, Cuba, Mexico and Puerto Rico.

To make a buck, we followed the sun, summer and winter," Bell said. "I didn't see Honus Wagner or the black league's pioneer best, John (Pop) Lloyd, but Willie was the best I saw. The 'Devil' or, as they called him in Mexico, 'El Diablo.' "

Wells replaced Rogers Hornsby as manager of the Vera Cruz Blues in 1947, the year The Rajah hit a game-winning home run for Jorge Pasquel, the man who raided the majors for talent. Wells was saluted for his ability to teach young players, including Monte Irvin, Ernie Banks, Don Newcombe and Larry Doby.

An injury limited Wells' throwing arm, but he overcame the handicap by not playing as deep. Bell says that Doby rated Wells ahead of Lou Boudreau, his championship manager with the Indians.

Bell's opinion is especially significant because Cool Papa is color blind. When Johnny Bench recently was named to the Hall of Fame, Bell observed, "All around, defensively and with that great power, Bench is the best catcher I ever saw—black or white."

As author Holway noted, Wells overcame early timidity by "inventing" the batting helmet. He knocked the gas jet off a coal miner's hardhat and used it at bat.

THE TOP PLAYERS

Biographies of some of the Negro leagues top players, compiled from historical files and by Rob Ruck, a Pittsburgh-based black baseball historian.

James (Cool Papa) Bell (1903-): Bell who lives on Cool Papa Bell Street in St. Louis, may have been the fastest player of all time. A lifetime .343 hitter, he had a .395 average in barnstorming tours against major leaguers. The outfielder batted .437 in Mexico in 1940, leading the league in home runs and RBI. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1973.

Oscar Charleston (1896-1954): Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1976, he was often called "the black Ty Cobb" and may have been the best black center fielder ever. He had a life time average of .351, including five .400-plus seasons, and had a .361 career average in the Cuban League. A left-handed power hitter, he played so shallow in center field that opponents accused him of being a fifth infielder.

Ray (Hooks) Dandrige (1913-): The Negro League's premier third baseman during a 16-year career, mostly with the Newark Eagles. A star in Mexico and Cuba, he played in the minor leagues in 1949 at age 36, passing himself off as a 29-year-old. He was a double-A rookie of the year that season and a most valuable player the next, but never played in the majors. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1987.

Martin Dihigo (1905-1971): The Negro League's answer to Babe Ruth was a pitcher-outfielder who could shut a team out one day, then beat them the next with a tape-measure home run. A lifetime .304 hitter, he had a 256-133 won-lost record and won batting, home run, victory, strikeout and earned run average honors in the Negro, Cuban and Mexican leagues. He led several leagues in both pitching and batting. He often played the year round and is the only player in the baseball hall of fames of Cuba, Mexico, Venezuela, and the United States. His bust at Latin American Stadium in Havana reads only: "The immortal." Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1977.

Monte Irvin (1919-): He played Negro League ball for 10 years, then was signed by New York Giants in 1949 as a 30-year-old rookie. A winner of 16 varsity sports letters in high school, he was a two-time Negro League batting champion. He hit .329 with 21 homers and 72 RBI for the Giants in 1953.

Josh Gibson (1911-1947): A fine defensive catcher for the Pittsburgh Crawfords and Homestead Gray who was black baseball's most feared slugger. He hit an estimated 1,000 career home runs in the Negro leagues and the Caribbean and had a .379 career average. His home runs at Forbes Field in Pittsburgh and Yankee Stadium are believed to be the longest at each; one of his drives was estimated at 700 feet, 134 feet longer than Mickey Mantle's longest shot. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1972.

William (Judy) Johnson (1899-): A third baseman with a rifle throwing arm. Connie Mack once said of Johnson. "If he were white, he could write his own price." He was the player-manager of the 1930 Homestead Grays before moving across Pittsburgh to join the then-dominant Crawfords. He was considered one of the top black managers and later scouted for the Athletics, Braves and Phillies. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1975.

Walter (Buck) Leonard (1907-): He didn't play pro ball until he was 25, but played until he was 48. He and Gibson were the foundation of the Homestead Grays, who won nine consecutive Negro League titles from 1937-45, and were black baseball's most feared right-left combination. A 12-time all-star, he had a .336, career average and led the Negro Leagues in homers and batting in 1939. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1972.

John Henry (Pop) Lloyd (1884-1965): Considered the top black shortstop of his era, he led the Negro League in batting, home runs and stolen bases in 1928—at age 44. He had a .342 career batting average that was overshadowed by his superb defensive play. He retired from the Negro League in 1932, at 48, only to play 10 more seasons of sandlot ball in Atlantic City. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1976.

Leroy (Satchel) Paige (1906-82): Perhaps the greatest pitcher of any era. He began his professional career in 1924 and ended it in 1967, playing before 10 million fans and winning an estimated 2,000 games in the Negro and Caribbean leagues, on barnstorming tours and exhibitions. He threw 55 no-hitters, sometimes after calling his outfielders off the field. The 6-3 right-hander's legendary "bee ball" fastball and hesitation pitches are part of baseball's lore. He didn't make it to the majors until 1948, when he was 42, but he pitched a shutout in his first start and his 6-1 record helped the Cleveland Indians to the World Series. His first six starts drew more than 200,000 fans. He pitched three shutout innings for the Kansas City Athletics in a 1965 start—at age 59. Inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1971.

(Smokey) Joe Williams (1886-1946): Considered the hardest throwing pitcher of his era, the 6-5 Williams—half-black and half-Indian—had amazing control. He didn't join the Homestead Grays until he was 39, but lost only five games in six seasons. He was 22-7-1 in 30 games against white all-star teams and was 8-2-1 against pitchers elected to the Hall of Fame. He was black baseball's top draw until the emergence of Paige.

RACISM SHORTCHANGES AFFLUENT BLACKS

(By Lee May)

WASHINGTON.—Once, the positions they hold and the success they enjoy were virtually impossible for black Americans to achieve. A wall of racism stood in the way.

But the civil rights movement of the 1960s helped clear the way. Then, their own ambition, skill and hard work did the rest.

Now—as politicians, educators, lawyers, doctors—they can enjoy the fruits of their achievement. And yet . . . .

Sometimes lingering manifestations of prejudice still get in the way.

Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young remembers coming out of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York when he was U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "Just because I was black, some guy wanted me to park his car," he said. ". . . I took the keys, and said: "Welcome to the Waldorf. I turned, and the guys who park the cars were elderly white gentlemen in uniform."

Bev Smith, who is the host of a radio talk show in Washington, remembers when she moved into a condominium complex.

"I was cleaning up and unpacking boxes and this lady who had a very thick accent knocked on the door and said: "Dahling, is the lady home?" It stunned me."

Smith said that later, when her daughter came home from college on a visit and went to the pool, "the lady walked up, knocked on the door and said: 'Girlie—for some reason she never asked my name—'you know, we don't allow the help to swim.' I said, 'That's a marvelous rule. I live here; I'm the lady of the house.' She went all red.

"She said: 'You're the lady of the house? You didn't tell me that.' I said: 'You didn't ask. . . . You didn't even ask me my name."

For the most part, the racism that was once exemplified by segregated lunch counters, water fountains and schools has been trampled under by civil rights marches and eliminated by federal laws. But, in many ways, the struggle against more subtle racism is the toughest to win.

Some call it New Racism or Racism of the '80s. James Gibson, director of the Rockefeller Foundation's national programs on equal opportunity, says this kind of bias is "an incubator of prejudicial attitudes and stereotypes," which "maintains social and cultural isolation."

Such racism is particularly obvious to economically successful blacks who otherwise seem to have gained acceptance in society.

Says Dr. Lillian Beard, a Washington pediatrician: "As a physician, I find in serving on boards and committees with my white colleagues, the assumption is that my patient load must be the urban poor. They will look to me to say: 'Well, that must be a real problem in your patient population' . . . They're usually amazed, because among my patient families are people in the diplomatic corps, congressional people and a number of professional people."

Ronald Kirk, assistant city attorney in Dallas and that city's federal lobbyist, says he meets subtle racism when shopping:

"There are lots of upscale men's shops I just won't frequent. You see white guys walk in and somebody greets them at the door, asking: 'Would you like a beer? How about a Coca-Cola?' And I could walk in, and I would think: 'God, (what would I have to do) before somebody decided they were going to wait on me.'

"Within the last year I was thinking of trading my BMW, so I went to a BMW dealer. I felt like if I shot myself in the head these people would probably hand me a mop and ask me to clean it up before somebody would come out and presume that this black guy was interested in buying a BMW or Porsche."

Ronald Walters, political science professor at Howard University, acknowledges that black "antennae" are especially sensitive to slights that white people may not notice. But whites do not have to worry about being racially discriminated against, he says, adding that repeated incidents have given blacks "empirical confirmation that you ain't crazy."

Successful blacks often face a terrible conflict, says Charles King, who, as director of the Urban Crisis Center in Atlanta conducts seminars to help businesses, schools and government agencies deal with racial problems in their organizations.

On the one hand, he says, they "are looking for something negative to happen every day," but on the other, they "always have to pretend that things are OK. It's like being a chameleon. You have to change colors, adopt a culture."

Says Beard: "Regardless of how you're dressed or what your general appearance is or how you speak or what degrees or letters may be behind your name, when you walk through any door you will always be described as the black whatever it is."

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I join today in the commemoration of Black History Month. I would like to thank my colleague, Mr. STOKES, for once again organizing a special order, giving us the opportunity to come together and share with each other our thoughts and hopes during this very special celebration.

Sixty-two years ago, Dr. Carter Woodson, a renowned historian, realized that an enormously important part of American history—black American history—was being ignored, even undermined, by historians and the public at large. Whether by the distortion that comes from naivety, outright racism, or simply lack of information, our country's history books had not included the outstanding contributions that blacks have made in building our Nation. To address this problem, Dr. Woodson proposed that a week be set aside, from Lincoln's Birthday to Frederick Douglas' birthday in February, to call attention to the vital role that blacks have played in American history.

History is not simply what happened, but what is remembered. This is why it is so important for us to not only remember Christopher Columbus and his ships, the Nina, Pinta, and Santa Maria, but the fact that the captain of the Nina was a black man. It is important for us to recall not just Robert Peary, who set out to find the North Pole, but Matthew Henson, the black man who found it before him.

Just as we appreciate researchers like Jonas Salk, we must honor scientific pioneers like Daniel Hale Williams, the black doctor in Cook County Hospital who performed the first open-heart surgery in 1893, Charles Drew, the black man from Washington DC, whose research on plasma and blood transfusions has saved millions of lives, and Percy Lavon Julian, who was the first scientist to synthesize cortisone.

This month is also a time to reflect on the pivotal role that black Americans assumed in the struggle for freedom and democracy in this country—to recall that Crispus Attucks was the first patriot to die for freedom at the Boston Massacre, and that two blacks were with Washington when he crossed the Delaware. It is a time to reflect on the bravery of Sojourner Truth and Harriet Tubman, who risked their lives to transport slaves to the North where a black person could be free.

We should also remember the landmark deed of a black woman, Rosa Parks, who stood up to the withering heat of discrimination by refusing to give up her seat on a bus to another person simply because she was black and the other person was white. Her dignity, courage, and determination helped launch the civil rights movement that shook America in the 1950's and 1960's and that continues to serve this country in many ways.

As we look back on the accomplishments and contributions of black Americans, we must remain vigilantly aware of this Nation's horrible legacy of racial prejudice. This month's election of former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke to the Louisiana State legislature is a clear reminder that racial discrimination has not yet been eradicated in this country, despite the claims of some that prejudice no longer exists.

History, once forgotten, tends to repeat itself. In my home city of New York alone, there have been over 350 incidents of racially motivated crimes committed against blacks in the past 2 years. Last March, for example, a black Coney Island supermarket clerk was beaten and stabbed by four white men while riding home on his bicycle. In June, a black man walking alone on Staten Island was beaten with bats and sticks by six white men. It is tragic that more than 20 years after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, hundreds of persons a year are assaulted, even killed, just because their skin is black.

Increased community attention, as well as newly instigated bias-response plans in States such as New York, which investigate and report on the impact of prejudice in a range of areas including education, criminal justice, legislation, and housing, are important steps in fighting racial discrimination. Yet we must press further. A shocking 70 percent of all bias-related crimes against blacks are committed by youths of 19 years or younger. If we are to put an end to racial bigotry, we must ensure that the younger generations are well versed in the horrible ramifications of discrimination, both past and present, and the stories of those who challenged and rose above this obstacle.

Once again, I would like to thank Representative STOKES for taking this time to commemorate Black History Month. By celebrating black history, our Nation is both acknowledging the omissions of the past, and enriching our national heritage with the brilliance, dignity, and unshakeable commitment to the freedom of black America.

Mr. POSHARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for this opportunity to recognize Black History Month. As a former history teacher I'm acutely aware of the numerous contributions made by black Americans throughout this Nation's history. I'm also aware of the need to make those contributions more well known and this is one way of doing that.

My district in the most southern part of Illinois experienced the struggle for civil rights like others did during the sixties and early seventies. That effort of course continues today. One the prominent organizations helping make changes take place is the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and I would like to thank the Carbondale Chapter, which serves my entire district, for its efforts.

Right alongside the more well known names in black history, Rosa Parks, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Jackie Robinson, are hundreds of less well-known names, perhaps more quiet in their diligence, perhaps simply less recognized for their contributions, great and small. In my area we can boast of three men from one town, Centralia, who've made their mark for their contributions and accomplishments.

I'm speaking of Donald McHenry, U.N. Ambassador in the Carter administration, William Norwood, the first black pilot of United Airlines who graduated from SIU and now serves on its board of trustees, and Roland Burris, another Centralia native and SIU graduate who as comptroller for the State of Illinois was the first black elected to statewide office in Illinois.

These are just a few of the people from my district who've helped make a difference, and there are many more on the way. Not long ago the Carbondale NAACP announced its Image Awards, for contributions to the black community. Dr. Nathaniel Felder, the director of planning for computing at SIU, is also local president of the NAACP. Dr. Felder tells me the association found itself in the position of pointing out areas where lack of effort and inattention were obvious, almost at the cost of forgetting to recognize those in the community making positive contributions. Out of this recognition sprang the Image Awards. If I might, I woud like to make the record for some of those recognized.

The top Image Award went to Dr. John Guyon, president of Southern Illinois University-Carbondale. Dr. Guyon was honored for his courage and integrity, exemplified by his decision to place a number of black professionals in important positions on campus, including vice president for academic affairs, vice president for student affairs, budget director, and a special position of assistant to the president for affirmative action. These are high-profile and demanding jobs within the university, the NAACP thought that should not go unrecognized.

Numerous awards also went to southern Illinois community members who are following the examples of black leaders we're honoring now and who are setting examples for others to follow and learn about in the years to come.

The Public Service Award went to the No. 9 Community Development Corporation. No. 9 is an old mining camp which it would seem progress has left in its wake. The leaders in No. 9 are actively working to bring sewer and water lines to the community, fighting for primary services so many of us take for granted. Their example is local, yet still historic.

Mr. Gajeef McNeil was honored for his efforts in the area of social service. Mr. McNeil helped organize and direct a number of community programs for the people of Carbondale.

Dr. Seymour Bryson was the Image Award winner for education. Dr. Bryson is the first black dean at SIU, and in that capacity he's made it possible for large numbers of minority students to attend college by admitting them to his college and assisting with financial support.

He also helped sponsor the Chico Vaughn basketball camp, which I'll talk more about in a moment.

In the area of religion, Rev. Dan Cross was recognized for his efforts at bringing a church to the community of Colp. Reverend Cross teaches at the high school in Carbondale, coaches basketball, and still finds time to start a church in an area where hope is often a scarce resource.

The Image Award for art went to Ms. Shirlene Holmes, who developed poems, literature, and artistic works for young people in the black community.

For business, the Image Award was given to Ms. Jean Dorsett-Robinson, president of Quality of Life Services, for her work in the local business community providing health services for the homebound.

In medicine, the NAACP's Image Award recipient was Dr. Wrophas Meeks, the only black radiologist in the area, and an active supporter of numerous community projects, including being president of the High School Booster Club.

In athletics, Stephen Bardo was honored for his contributions on and off the basketball court. Stephen, one of the finest athletes ever from my area, is a starting guard on the University of Illinois Basketball Team, which has been rated in the Top 20 all year long. Stephen is a young man able to negotiate the rigors of basketball and academics at one of the Nation's most prestigious schools, and he always comes back home to spend time with impressionable youngsters who find a reliable role model in his life.

Honorable mention in this category went to Chico Vaughn. Mr. Vaughn, a recordsetting high school player and the all-time leading scorer at SIU, recently returned to the university to finish his degree in physical education. For that, the NAACP wanted to recognize him, for his determination to overcome some of the obstacles placed in his way and persevere is certainly something worth emulating.

I would hope as we remember the great and prominent names, Justice Thurgood Marshall, James Meredith, James Baldwin, and Shirley Chisolm, that we would also remember our local heroes and heroines, who are side by side with those more prominent names in shaping our Nation's direction.

Every Member has residents of his or her district who fit this example. I'm proud to say I have many. I hope our efforts help us develop hundreds and thousands more.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join our colleagues in the celebration of Black History Month. Every February, America reflects upon the achievements of its black citizens and, each year, during this month we see how our Nation's character has become richer and better. When I entered the U.S. House of Representatives in 1955, few would have envisioned that a black man could run for President or serve on the Supreme Court. These are milestones which are a tribute to where we are in the journey to Dr. King's "promised land." However, we must remember how far we still must go.

America has made great strides toward racial equality during the 20th century, but we must continue to make them. Eighty years ago, a group of 60 black and white Americans founded the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In the years following the founding of the NAACP, America endured the Great Depression, saw its emergence as a world power, and witnessed the civil rights struggles of the 1950's and 1960's. From the southern fields to the northern factories, day in and day out, blacks gave their sweat, tears, and sometimes their lives to advance themselves and improve their lives. Yet, during this time, the richness of the flourishing black culture went largely unnoticed by a majority of Americans. In a sense, this is what Black History Month is about; we reflect upon the black community's contributions to our national history and heritage, and look ahead to the day when we reach the end of the long journey against racial injustice and intolerance.

As the NAACP and other organizations fought for equality, Americans' eyes were opened to the scourge of racism. The sacrifices made by millions of Americans, both black and white, to end segregation in the United States were unprecedented. While we do not know all of their names, we must never forget these brave men and women who fought for what was right. America needs to remember this chapter of its history, both for the courage of those working for justice, and for the ugliness of those working against it.

Mr. Speaker, as we come to the end of another decade, and approach the last decade of this century, let us recommit ourselves to breaking the barriers to equality which still exist. While change can be slow, we must remember that the principle of our Nation—liberty, equality, and freedom—must be the vehicle that carries us to the "promised land." During the 28 days of February, let all Americans, in their own way, reflect upon what contributions they can make to shorten that journey.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Mr. STOKES, for calling this special order on Black History Month. This year's theme, "the role of Afro-American churches in economic, political, and social development at home and abroad," is particularly relevant to my district because the church has been the leader in so many of San Francisco's community efforts. I am proud to take part in this special order, and I appreciate the opportunity to give public recognition to the significance and creativity of the Afro-American Church in our society.

Reverend Cecil Williams of Glide Memorial Church has made significant contributions in assisting the homeless, and in aiding San Francisco's war on drugs. Glide now feeds on the average of 2,000 to 3,000 people a day. The church offers 3 meals a day, 7 days a week to the city's homeless and impoverished.

Glide also offers weekly self help groups for crack users, which provide both professional and peer counseling. In fact, Reverend Williams is currently in the process of organizing a national conference on crack in the black family which will be held in San Francisco later this spring. I applaud Reverend Williams for his dedication to pursuing solutions to the problems that face our city and Nation.

St. Paul of the Shipwreck, in the Hunter's Point/Bayview section of San Francisco, is fortunate to have Father Jim Goode as its pastor. Last summer Father Goode organized a series of community forums to help find solutions to the problems that plague the Hunter's Point community. Among the most successful was the economic development forum which taught members of the community how to start and manage their own small businesses. Another conference was centered on the black child, and focused on black males and their children. Through these types of programs, which are designed to encourage and inspire, Father Goode strives to promote self-esteem among his congregation.

In 1852, the Third Baptist Church was founded in the city of San Francisco. Since that time the church has been active in two issues of importance to the city; refugee resettlement and supplemental and tutorial services for inner city youth. Reverend Amos Brown has coordinated a detailed and comprehensive program designed to equip new immigrants to San Francisco with the necessary skills to become productive and self-sufficient. His program includes temporary housing, job training, and job placement services. More than 300 refugees from all over the world received assistance through the reverend's program last year. I think it is important to note that Third Baptist is reaching out to many other ethnic minorities, thereby enriching the entire community.

Reverend Brown also runs an after school enrichment program not only to help the children of his congregation with their schoolwork, but also to give them the cultural opportunities that many of them lack. Through their involvement with the Charles Tindley Academy, many of the children of Third Baptist have achieved success in musical pursuits and have been exposed to a new world.

I am proud to represent an area where such creativity and innovation abound. I am convinced that with the help of many of these Afro-American churches, we will find solutions to the many problems that face us today. I look forward to continuing my work with the Congressional Black Caucus to ensure that issues like homelessness, education, and drugs are addressed with effective community based solutions.

I am encouraged by the activity of Afro-American churches in my district and throughout this country. I commend the creativitiy and achievement of Reverend Brown, Father Goode, and Reverend Williams and the other churches in San Francisco for the important services they are providing to our community.

Again, I thank the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. STOKES, for organizing this important special order. Thank you.

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to acknowledge and commend the many outstanding contributions of black Americans, both to the State of Alabama and the Nation, during this year's observance of Black History Month.

The celebration of the birthday of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. just last month reminded us of his efforts to stir the conscience of our Nation. Our remembrance of his vision of a better future for all Americans brought back memories of our tumultuous past, progressive present, and promising future.

Of course, there are many others who deserve our acknowledgement and remembrance, who, in their own way, were just as assiduous in their efforts to assure that black Americans are afforded all the rights and privileges guaranteed all citizens of these United States in the Constitution. Their combined determination opened American society to all, providing the opportunity to excel in all professions and fields. Because of that, all of us in this Nation have benefited. It is those who paved the path, as well as those who walk it, whom we honor during this very special month.

Birmingham, AL, which I represent in the House, was a focal point of the civil rights struggle, and we in Birmingham are keenly aware of the importance of access to political and economic opportunity for all citizens. The people of Birmingham have made a concerted effort to overcome the images of the past, applying its lessons and messages to creatively serve present and future needs.

From our Nation's earliest history to today, there is no facet of our society that has not enjoyed the contributions of and leadership from black Americans. Their successes span across education, sports, science, industry, music, literature, and the arts. This includes people like Mary McLeod Bethune, noted educational leader who became the first black woman to receive a major appointment in the Federal Government; Jesse Owens, world-class athlete and U.S. Olympian; Shirley Chisholm, the first black woman elected to Congress; Dr. Charles Drew, who developed the first blood plasma bank; Dr. Daniel Hale Williams, who performed the first successful open heart surgery; and Percy Lavon Julian, who was the first scientist to synthesize cortisone.

They include Sidney Poitier, first black to win an Academy Award for best actor; Ralph Bunch, U.N. Ambassador and first black to win the Nobel Peace Prize; Gwendolyn Brooks, first black to win a Pulitzer; Edward W. Brooke, the only black U.S. Senator since Reconstruction; Jan Metzeliger, inventor of the first automated shoemaking machine; and Colin Powell, first black to head the National Security Council.

Many do not know that the term "the real McCoy" refers to the numerous creations of inventor Elijah McCoy, or that Garrett A. Morgan, who was black, invented the electric traffic signal and gas mask.

I find it most appropriate that the national Black History Month theme for 1989 is "The Role of Afro-American churches in Economic, Political, and Social Development at Home and abroad," for it is from this particular institution that the groundswell of support for broad and far reaching change in our Nation found its origin.

As we observe this year's Black History Month, let us commit ourselves to continuing to work for policies in this country that provide all citizens with the chance to share in the opportunity for economic prosperity our Nation offers, and give Dr. King's dream a continuing reality for tomorrow and all the tomorrows to come.

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to acknowledge Black History Month and the many people who devoted their lives to make our country great. One such notable person that contributed greatly to our communities is the late Alfred Osborne.

Mr. Osborne was born in Charleston, SC on October 6, 1932 to the late Lucille Ross and Albert Osborne. He received his public education in Charleston and much later in life, returned to school In 1984, he received a degree in business management from Prince George's Community College.

Mr. Osborne joined the U.S. Air Force in May 1950. His honorable career included duty within the war zones of both the Korean and Vietnam conflicts, for which he was awarded several decorations. He accepted an early retirement from the Air Force in 1964, due to service-connected disabilities. Through his participation with several national military service organizations, such as the Disabled American Veterans [DAV], he was instrumental in serving his fellow veterans.

In addition, Mr. Obsorne was extremely active in civic and political affairs. One of his major accomplishments, of which he was most proud, was the developoment of "Say Nope to Dope," a community-based organization established in Prince George's County, MD, to combat substance abuse. In addition he was elected to the Prince George's County Democratic Central Committee in 1986. He also served with distinction with the American Federation of Government Employees.

Through his hard work and devotion to young people, Mr. Osborne served his community well, As a member of Ebenezer African Methodist Episcopal Church in Fort Washington, Mr. Obsorne was an active member in the Community Involvement Ministries. Mr. Osborne departed this life on October 23, 1988. He will be missed, but his legacy will go on.

I am pleased to acknowledge the late Mr. Alfred Osborne for his outstanding contribution in honor of Black History Month.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to remark on Black History Month and on the progress of civil rights in our Nation. Victories have been won since the enactment of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The most recent examples of progress made are the very credible campaign for the Democratic Presidential nomination that Jesse Jackson waged last year and the election of Ron Brown as chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Achievements within the political arena also include the victories won by individuals within both political parties, by my colleagues in Congress and by individuals in State legislatures across the country. Victories won inside the executive arena include the election of Bill White as National League president; he is the first black American to serve as president of a major professional sports league. Clearly, black Americans are attaining positions of leadership in areas that have traditionally been off limits to them.

Yet despite these accomplishments, ample evidence suggests that the struggle for equality and justice is far from over. Disturbingly, some evidence suggests that the struggle has only begun.

During the Reagan era, efforts were made to turn back the clock on many of the civil rights gains already won. The former President vetoed the reauthorization of two major civil rights bills intended to enhance and improve the freedoms of all Americans—the Voting Rights Act and the Civil Rights Restoration Act. In addition, the Reagan adminstration appointed fewer black and Hispanic judges in its 8 years then the previous administration did in 4. And, in an effort to win the White House, the Bush campaign created and relied on a racially charged issue—the Willie Horton issue—to attract voters.

But Mr. Speaker, perhaps most disturbing is the recent election of David Duke, a former Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard, as Republican State representative of the 81st District in Louisiana. The fact that a man who has devoted his entire adult life to promoting the subordination of black Americans is a shocking reminder that the struggle to end racial discrimination continues.

Now more than ever, our Nation must remain committed to eliminating racial discrimination and to promoting equality and opportunity for all. While there is reason to look back with pride, we must also move forward with hope and courage.

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in reflecting on the role of the Afro-American church in our society. I thank Congressman STOKES and Congressman DELLUMS for organizing this special order in recognition of Black History Month.

One of this Nation's greatest leaders, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was a Baptist minister. His leadership through the church is just one example of how the Afro-American church—as an institution and as a base for social change—has affected all of our lives. Today Dr. King is nationally recognized for his role in motivating and organizing thousands of Americans to fight for civil rights and an end to discrimination.

That fight, however, must continue. Discrimination and racism still persist in our Nation and require us to be ever vigilant. This is just one of the roles church leaders have taken. In Long Island, NY, there are over 50 Afro-American churches. For the record, I would like to submit the statements on their role in Long Island. The following statement is written by the Reverend Dr. Ralph Jefferson, minister of the Jefferson Temple, Church of God in Christ, located in Bellport, NY. The Reverend Jefferson has been involved in ministry for 25 years on Long Island.

JEFFERSON TEMPLE, CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST

"The Role of Afro-American Churches in Economic, Political, and Social Development at Home and Abroad."

From pre and post slavery, the Black church has always been pre-eminent, and probably always will be. For many Blacks the church is a meeting place; it's a place of unity and strength. In the church the feeling of ambiguity vanishes and he feels no longer inadequate; because in his or her church he feels wanted, useful and needed. Number one, he is a minority but in his church he is a majority.

The basic role of the Afro-American church in Economics. Most all Afro-American churches are out of the red. This is one of the few places that Afro-American pool their money. The parishioner in the black church loves his church. Many black churches own property, housing developments and business projects. Many of these monies are put in a black owned bank called the Carver Bank of New York. Some are put into the money market. From this the church pays the ministers, secretary and custodian. I would say that the average black church is well off in term of finance. The church is his panacea. He will give his last to let his fellow brother know that he has contributed to the offering to help the cash flow cause.

The political stand point of view. The political system runs our country; sometime dirty and sometime clean cut politics. Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King used the church to unite the black man. Every black pastor has the potential to become a great leader. What we as black clergy say to our congregation concering voting; our voice is generally the voice of their opinion. We have come to realize that we must be a solid block in voting because it's not only a given right and a privilege but also a must. If we want action in our communities, we must vote. The church is the best organizer. Dr. King led his last march in Memphis, Tennessee. The Rally took place at the Church of God in Christ at Mason Temple, world headquarters for all churches of God in Christ. Not only must we vote but we must try to vote every qualified black person in office to help represent our districts. I, Rev. Ralph Jefferson was the first black to run for public office in the village of Southampton, Long Island, NY before and after reconstruction. I lost by less than twelve votes. Being a clergyman, I was well recognized by both races.

The social development at home and abroad. In the black church the ties are very close; the proximity runs from heart to heart and breast to breast: because he feels that he is with his peers and bonded together by common ground. It's at church that he learns to sit together, sing together, pray together, work together, and socialize together for the same cause. From this we send black missionaries all over the world. This is done through the church. Religion shapes personality, molds conducts and motivates the human will.

Through the black church the stigma has been expurgated. In my conclusion, in every black community the church is basic. Without a black church in his community, he would be inadequate.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit the following statement by Suffolk County (New York) Executive Patrick G. Halpin on the role of Afro-American churches on Long Island:

STATEMENT OF SUFFOLK COUNTY EXECUTIVE PATRICK G. HALPIN, THE ROLE OF BLACK COMMUNITY CHURCHES

Suffolk County's extensive communal mosaic is highlighted by our local black community churches.

In Suffolk County, we are fortunate to have over 50 African-American churches, some of which have been in our community for over 200 years. Their local influence is extensive, as it is similar to the positive influence that all black community churches have had throughout America.

Indeed Suffolk's black community churches have made an indelible contribution to the quality of life for all.

As the primary educator on all issues of concern to the family and community, from the dangers of drug abuse, AIDS and teenage pregnancy to the promise of education, job training and voter participation, they are vital institutions in the African-American community. They serve as a beacon of righteousness, stability and hope to a community that too often is the first to feel our national problems and to experience them at a heightened level of despair.

In Suffolk County, as elsewhere, churches are on the frontline of our efforts to eliminate poverty and provide a safe and healthy environment for our children to grow up in. Black churches on Long Island can be found everyday providing meals and shelter to our indigent, child care and family counseling to our young families, security and vitality to our elderly and a strong sense of community to all of us.

Black community churches made an indelible imprint and significant contribution to the quality of life in Suffolk County. Because the black church has historically been a place owned by the African-American community, it has always been a sanctuary from discrimination; a place where everyone is equal. Thus, it is no surprise that the equality nurtured in the church has inspired action. And it is appropriate that it is within the black church that communities organize to fight for their civil rights and their community's empowerment.

Ultimately, because of its emphasis on equality, kindness and idealism, the black community church provides sanctuary to us all.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, the history of blacks in the United States is a powerful history, and one which must never be forgotten. The celebration of Black History Month is a way of recognizing, and reminding the United States and the world of the achievements of African Americans, and their many triumphs throughout history.

At the height of the civil rights movement, black leaders such as Martin Luther King, Jr., Adam Clayton Powell, and Jesse Jackson, utilized their capacity as religious leaders to organize the political base necessary to question discriminatory policy. With this new, tightly organized political backbone, black leaders in the United States were able to accomplish more during the decade of upheaval that occurred during the 1960's than ever before, thrusting today's African-American agenda for equal rights into mainstream politics. The African-American church, which had always served as a community focal point for blacks, had taken on the function of political organizing. In conjunction with the role played by the African-American church in the political spectrum, a new wave of black political figures have now been able to emerge forcefully to embrace the opportunities acquired during the civil rights struggle.

One principle achievement that black religious organizers gained from this turbulent period was the creation of expanded possibilities for bringing all aspects of the lives of Afro-Americans; political, social, and economic, up to a commensurate level enjoyed by the majority of American society. These same leaders have allowed the black community to work within and through the political system for change. This does not necessarily make change easier, but certainly increases the occasion for change to occur. I strongly believe that we are at the doorstep of the greatest changes that are to come for improving overall racial status in U.S. society. Every advance made for blacks is progress for all groups; ethnic, racial, religious, or any other distinction. I ask my colleagues to participate in the fulfillment of this obligation to modern society in the 101st Congress and beyond.

Perhaps the most important end the black leaders of the civil rights movement attained was the ability for social organizations, black and white, to work together to achieve the goals which were both necessary and ultimately forthcoming. At the time of Martin Luther King's death on April 4, 1968, he was planning a mass march on Washington which was to include blacks, Hispanic Americans, American Indians, and poor whites. Prior to, and at the height of the civil rights movement, the only possible approach for empowering the underprivileged segments of U.S. society was through these grassroots efforts, since these groups were held back from utilizing the mainstream political system.

Today we have the opportunity to carry on the dream of absolute equality, both de jure and de facto, by politically mainstreaming every segment of America's melting pot. This entails such measures as increasing voter participation by all citizens, and encouraging more public participation at the grassroots level. By doing so, all subdivisions of our society will have the ability to be fairly represented in order to bring about social and economic parity. However, this is an elusive dream, with many potential pitfalls. Only through the cooperation of Government leadership, and the citizens we serve will we ever achieve these aims.

We honor today Americans who have advanced these goals for the society of the United States through their courage and ingenuity. Leaders in their callings throughout U.S. history such as George Washington Carver, Ralph Waldo Ellison, Jesse Owens, Ralph Bunche, "Bojangles" Robinson, Louis Armstrong, Dr. Daniel Hale Williams, Dr. Charles Drew, and Martin Luther King, Jr., cleared a path for today's leaders in their fields such as Jesse Jackson, William Clay, Thurgood Marshall, Shirley Chisholm, Ron Brown, Dr. Jane Wright, Doug Williams, Jackie Joyner Kersey, Gregory Hines, and a multitude of others who set the pace and direction not just for black society, but for all society. These are all people who have distinguished themselves not by their race or the color of their skin, but by their achievements. Their excellence in their pursuits must never be ignored nor forgotten, and will serve as a model to future generations of Americans and to the world.

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus and other members of this body in commemoration of Black History Month—a time to celebrate the African-American heritage and to commemorate the legacies of our ancestors.

While we have traditionally set aside 1 month for this observance, I strongly feel that we should recognize and remember African-American history every day and not just during the month of February. Just imagine within the last several months the great strides African-American's have made in the political field alone.

We've just completed a year where the Rev. Jesse Jackson again assembled a positive and inspiring second bid for the Presidency and Ron Brown was elected to head one of our major political parties. Additionally, we have seen wider representation of African-Americans in State and local government and right here in Congress with the addition of Donald Payne of New Jersey. Indeed, we have made great strides and will make even greater strides in the months and years to come.

In sports we have seen such talented African-Americans as Florence Griffith-Joyner, Debbie Thomas, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, Mike Tyson, Michael Jordan, Zina Garrison, to name a few, excel in their respective fields. While in the entertaiment field stars such as Bill Cosby, James Earl Jones, Danny Glover, Eddie Murphy and Oprah Winfrey, have impressed many. In the field of literature we have seen Alice Walker, Toni Morrison, Nikki Giovanni, and Alex Haley, eloquently express the history and experience of African-Americans.

I believe that it is most important that we always remember that African-Americans have contributed to the betterment of our Nation and that their acts do not stand solely independent of the accomplishments and good works of our society and culture as a whole.

Commemorating Black History Month is of great significance and it is crucial that we remember the achievements of our ancestors, and those of our more contemporary counterparts, as part of our American heritage. By remembering our past and recognizing the need for our contributions to the future, we will then, to quote one of our Nation's influential leaders, "keep hope alive."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, in observance of Black History Month I would like to honor Mary McLeod Bethune—educator, civil rights reformer, government official and religious leader. One of the most influential women in the United States for more than three decades, Bethune was able to provide numerous social, educational and economic opportunities for blacks. Her efforts showed people of all colors the importance of realizing "the dreams and the hopes and the problems of my long-suffering people."

Born in 1875, Bethune was the first of 17 children. Her parents, former slaves freed during the Civil War, struggled as farmers in the post-Reconstruction era to raise funds for the education of their oldest child. Bethune's schooling began at a small black mission school near Mayesville, SC, where she quickly mastered its offerings. With the help of various scholarships she was able to attend college and missionary school. Bethune went on to teach for several years during her early adulthood.

Possibly Bethune's greatest achievement came in 1904 when she gathered $1.50 in capital and enrolled six students to start her own school in Daytona, FL. Bethune opened the Daytona Normal and Industrial School for Negro Girls with hopes of providing a curriculum that would promote the "development of the mind, hands and heart." Bethune was forced from the start to work overtime to secure funds and supplies for her school. She collected boxes for benches, charcoals for pencils, and mashed elderberries for ink.

When recalling her efforts to buy land for a new campus in 1907, she wrote:

I learned that one of my most important jobs was to be a good beggar. I rang doorbells and tackled cold prospects without a lead . . . If a prospect refused to make a contribution I would say "thank you for your time." No matter how deep my hurt, I always smiled. I refused to be discouraged, for neither God nor man could use a discouraged soul.

Bethune's relentless efforts were rewarded as enrollment grew to more than 250 students within 2 years. Within 20 years the institute had expanded to eight buildings and a farm. In 1923 the school became the Bethune-Cookman College and the college conferred degrees in teacher education upon its first 4-year graduates in 1943.

Bethune's influence went far beyond her school as she also championed the need for broader educational, social, and political opportunities for blacks. Despite threats from the terrorist Ku Klux Klan, she led a successful black voter registration drive in 1920 for recently enfranchised women. That same year she founded and became president of a regional association which developed into the Southeastern Federation of Colored Women. Four years later her work culminated in the presidency of National Association of Colored Women, an office regarded by many as the highest office to which a black woman could aspire. Under her leadership, NACW raised funds and purchased a building in Washington, DC, to serve as a permanent national headquarters.

Bethune began a second career with the Federal Government under the Roosevelt administration as a special adviser on minority affairs. By 1939 she had become the director of the Division of Negro Affairs in the National Youth Administration. Bethune ensured blacks were allowed equal participation in NYA programs. While not all of Bethune's efforts to ensure equality were successful, she was able to make numerous breakthroughs toward integrating minorities into Federal programs.

While in Washington, Bethune served as leader of the Federal Council on Negro Affairs, an informal organization group of black Federal officials. Popularly known as the black cabinet, the group sought to secure increased benefits for blacks from the Federal Government. As one of the few blacks to have access to the White House, Bethune was able to educate Eleanor Roosevelt on the problems facing black Americans and discuss black needs with President Franklin Roosevelt.

Bethune championed her democratic values until she died in 1955 from a heart attack. Her presence can still be seen today in numerous ways. A bronze statue commemorating her leadership stands in Lincoln Park, Washington, DC. Unveiled in 1974, it was the first statue in honor of any woman, and of any black, in a public park in our Nation's Capital. More important are those who continue Bethune's legacy of assisting fellow minorities by aspiring to greater levels of public service. Athalie Range, former Miami city commissioner and prominent black activist, is one of the many who uphold Bethune's tradition of pursuing equal opportunities for blacks.

The last stains of racism will be erased if people of all colors follow the examples of Mary McLeod Bethune. Then Black History Month can serve not as a reminder of the inequality woven throughout black history, but as a time to celebrate the rich heritage of a vital part of our culture.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join with my colleagues in recognizing Black History Month and honoring African-Americans who have fought for freedom and equality. I thank my good friend and colleague, LOUIS STOKES, for reserving this special order to commemorate Black History Month.

In Connecticut, many African-Americans have fought for their dream of freedom. Prudence Crandall became one of America's first black schoolteachers. She emphasized the importance of literacy among all people. Levi Jackson graduated from Hillhouse High School and became Yale's first black football captain in 1949. Later he would become an executive with General Motors. Ms. Crandall and Mr. Jackson's drive and desire to succeed helped them to become two of America's finest examples of success.

I would like to share with my colleagues a particularly important piece of New Haven history. The Amistad affair, which occurred in New Haven 150 years ago, signifies the determination of a group of African born men and women. Led by a man named Cinque, the Africans fought doggedly for their freedom and for their return to Africa. The following statement appeared in a New Haven Register editorial earlier this year:

One hundred and fifty years ago this year, there began in New Haven a strange and heart-wrenching drama that eventually led to one of the most important civil rights decisions in the Nations history. That drama came to be known as the Amistad affair, and it was all about slavery and freedom and men and women of good will extending helping hands to their brothers and sisters.

Briefly stated, in the summer of 1839 a ship named the Amistad—a word that, ironically means friendship—brought a cargo of slaves from Africa to America. En route the slaves seized control of the ship and unsuccessfully attempted to sail back to Africa.

Spotted off the coast of Long Island by a U.S. revenue cutter, the Amistad was taken to New London where the Africans were arrested on the word of the Amistad's Spanish crewman who claimed the Africans were their property and should be returned to him along with the ship.

The slaves were interned in New Haven and their cause was taken up by a number of citizens and fought through the courts until finally, in March 1841, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a lower court ruling that they were free men and women illegally detained and were, therefore, at liberty to return to their homes in Africa.

Throughout the long months of their captivity in an alien land, the Amistad captives conducted themselves with great dignity and with the same gritty determination to secure their freedom in the courts that they had shown in seizing the Amistad from the slave traders in the first place. Their leader, Cinque, speaking in halting English that he learned while in captivity, explained what the Africans wanted in the simple phrase: "Give us free."

Though separated in time by more than a century, Martin Luther King Jr. and the Amistad captives—and those New Haveners who rallied to their cause—shared an unquenchable thirst for liberty and an unwavering belief in the dignity of all men and women. And those themes remain as vital for our city and our nation and as difficult to obtain and sustain today as they were then.

The Amistad affair captures the spirit of many African-Americans today. Their perseverance, their dignity, and their determination is similar to that of the men and women of the Amistad. The African captives on the Amistad had as their objective to seize control of their destiny, which was the simple desire to steer their own destiny.

This year, New Haven is celebrating Black History Month with exhibits, movies, receptions, and numerous other events to commemorate Black History Month. The Yale University Art Gallery is presenting a film series entitled, "Black Music at the Movies." The films being shown include "The Wiz" and film footage of pioneers such as Chuck Berry and Do Diddley. The African-American Historical Society is presenting a lecture and recital concert. Jack Johnson, American's first black heavyweight champion will be honored at the Afro-American Cultural Center.

Mr. Speaker, we gather here to honor those African-Americans who have helped to create the America we live in today. People like Prudence Crandall, Levi Jackson, and Cinque, who reached their dream of freedom and contributed to the history of America.

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, this year's theme for National Black History Month is "The Role of African-American Churches in the Economic, Political, and Social Development of African-Americans at Home and Abroad."

The African-American church has been significant in the lives of black Americans since our first steps on this continent 400 years ago. It is appropriate, therefore, to recognize the contributions of the African-American church and its leaders on this occasion.

When we address the economic, political, and social development of black people in America, we must speak about the work of the black church and its leaders. In many ways, the greatest strides of Black Americans have come in concert with those made by the church. For example, the inspirational words of Martin Luther King often emanated from the pulpit at Ebenezer Baptist Church. While the strength of our former colleague, Adam Clayton Powell, was rooted in the congregation at Abbyssisian.

The African-American church and political progress for black Americans continue to go hand in hand. Several Members of this representative's House including, BILL GRAY, WALTER FAUNTROY, JOHN LEWIS, FLOYD FLAKE, and myself, had our first calling in the Lord's house. Malcolm X, Jesse Jackson, C.T. Vivian, and Ralph Abernathy are others whose words have moved an entire race, if not the world.

The black church in America not only transmits religious values and engages in charitable projects, but it is the focal point of bootstrap economics and self-help. Black entrepreneurship, in many ways, was born out of a church-led process promoting aggressive self-determination. Black insurance companies, banks, newspapers, and a host of smaller businesses owe much of their survival to the economic muscle of the church.

Father Divine and Bishop C.W. "Daddy" Grace were ministers who combined religion and economics in an attempt to absorb the black poor into their flocks. Grace and Divine operated businesses and provided hundreds of jobs for the unemployed. Father Divine's parishoners even grew food at farm co-ops, providing free meals for those who entered his church.

The leaders guiding our brothers and sisters overseas in the fight against aparthied South Africa, are also men of the cloth. Nobel laureate Bishop Tutu and Rev. Alan Boesak evoke memories of Dr. King's peaceful struggle against hostile and violent surroundings.

Today, the African-American community continues to draw on the strength of the church. In all, there are 65,000 churches with a membership in excess of 20 million people. The size and influence of African-American churches makes it clear that church leaders should and must continue to lead America's black families to the promised land.

Black churches must serve as the means by which African-Americans find spiritual strength and understanding in our quest for justice and freedom. And our leaders must interpret issues and news events in light of their impact on black people to ensure that they can, and do, fully participate in economic, political, and social developments at home and abroad.

For missions accomplished, and to be accomplished, we acknowledge the contributions of the African-American church and its leaders duiring this February in 1989, known to all as Black History Month.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the congressional observance of Black History Month. It is of special interest for me that this year's theme for the congressional observance deals with the spiritual aspect of the lives of black Americans. I believe that a tremendous example of that spiritual power as it relates to the economic and social growth of black Americans lives and works within my congressional district, California's 32d District.

A seemingly short time ago I had the pleasure of welcoming to my Washington office the Reverend Carl Fisher of the St. Frances Xavier Parish in Baltimore. Father Fisher had been selected by Pope John Paul II to be an auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Bishop-designate Fisher was to serve in the Greater San Pedro area as the bishop of that large area. I very much wanted to welcome him to the area he would serve as much of the area lies within my congressional district.

What a splendid day it was when the new member of the American Catholic hierarchy came to visit. Erudite and outgoing, the new bishop delighted all who met him. It immediately became evident to me that a powerful spiritual force had come into my district and I knew the opportunity would be a successful and promising one for the people whom this dynamic man would serve.

As we celebrate the observance of Black History Month, it is a distinct honor for me to tell this body that all that one might have hoped for Bishop Fisher has come to reality. He is a powerful and positive force within the area for all of the inhabitants he helps. In a relatively short time the bishop has become firmly established and is noted everywhere for the power of his message and the graciousness of his efforts. I salute Bishop Carl Fisher, and on behalf of my wife Lee, myself, and all of the people of California's 32d Congressional District, I wish him, "ad multos annos!"

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in this special order commemorating "the role of Afro-American churches in economic, political, and social development at home and abroad." As we bring to a close this year's Black History Month, I would like to focus on the accomplishments and contributions of the black church.

The black church has had a unique influence on our culture from slavery to modern times. In the South, the church became the institution that gave blacks a ray of hope of one day being free, and a vision of what freedom would mean. In the North, the black church was founded by free blacks who were striving for a better life.

Throughout our history, the black minister belonged to a unique breed. It was he who gave the slave hope and inspiration. It was he who eased the hard journey with comforting sentiment. It was he who created the setting in which spirituals were born. The preacher was among the first blacks who learned to read and write. He was not just a spiritual leader, but a teacher. When the time came for courageous action in the South, he assisted in the Underground Railroad, while his counterparts in the North became active in the abolitionist movement. Ministers like Bishop Richard Allen, the founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, were aggressive and astute businessmen.

During slavery, blacks developed their own means of communication through spirituals which provided the means to not only express their deepest emotions, but secretly communicate with one another. The scholar Alain Locke eloquently summarized the historic significance of spirituals when he said:

They have outlived the particular generation and the peculiar conditions which produced them; they have survived in turn the contempt of the slave owners, the conventionalizations of formal religion, the repressions of Puritanism, the corruptions of sentimental balladry, and the neglect and disdain of second-generation respectability. They have escaped the lapsing conditions and the fragile vehicle of folk art, and come firmly into the context of formal music.

Some spirituals served as "freedom songs," leading slaves to freedom, such as "Steal away home to Jesus, I ain't got long to stay here." They were born out of religious exaltations, and were the most genuine expressions of Christian mood and feeling in the modicum of religious music. These spirituals told a haunting, sorrowful story of suffering, disappointment, and yet hope of a better tomorrow.

Spirituals are now a rich and cherished classic art form which has been passed on from one generation to the next. The songs sung by gospel singers such as Thomas A. Dorsey, Willie May Ford Smith, Sally Martin, the O'Neil Twins, Mahalia Jackson, the Clara Ward Singers, James Cleveland, and Shirley Ceasar have kept the rich spirituals alive. And, even more contemporary rhythm and blues singers like Aretha Franklin have been influenced by this folk art.

For blacks, the church has always been more than just a place to worship. It formed the foundation of black economic empowerment, germinated the seeds of political power, and provided a base of black social life.

Black economic empowerment began with education. In the 18th century, education had long been viewed as the most promising avenue to acceptance, and as a means of achieving equality. Mutual benefit societies sponsored schools for freed blacks beginning in 1796. With the establishment of black churches, schools and educational programs begin to flourish. It was not unusual to find a school in the basement of the church's main sanctuary. For example, Alabama State College was founded in the basement of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery. By the 1900's, the Baptists were supporting some 80 schools and 18 academies and colleges. The A.M.E. church raised thousands of dollars and supported 22 institutions, including a college.

Black religious leaders were the motivating force that gave blacks the incentive to start businesses to help compete economically. When banks refused to allow blacks through the doors, churches established their own credit unions. Economic development was a serious priority, and the church encouraged the building of financial alternatives.

The black church has spearheaded programs throughout the community as well as abroad. Through community outreach programs, the church works actively to foster a Christian environment of sharing and concern. Churches have always helped to feed and cloth the hungry, provide youth and marital counseling services, and foster community awareness of the perils of drug abuse. In an ongoing assault against high attrition rates in the school, tutoring programs have been established and voter education promoted.

Churches are creating jobs, motivated in part by the alarming increase in homelessness and unemployment in the black community. Scholarship programs continue to encourage our youth to pursue higher education. Credit unions, insurance programs, housing projects, and day care centers are programs churches have created to improve the worsening social problems in this country.

The black church is the most important arena of political life in our communities. Ministers such as Rev. Alfred Charles Livingston Arbouin (founder of Dexter Baptist Church in Montgomery, AL), Rev. Vernon Johns (of Dexter), Rev. Mordecai Johnson, Howard Thurman, Rev. Raymond Henderson, Rev. Archie Williams (founder of Trinity Baptist Church in Los Angeles) and Rev. Jonathan L. Caston (Trinity Baptist), Rev. Martin Luther King, Sr. (Ebenezer Church in Atlanta) and Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. (Dexter Baptist Church), and contemporaries like Thomas Kilgore (Second Baptish Church in Los Angeles), Elliot Mason (Trinity), Cecil L. Murray (First A.M.E. in Los Angeles), Dumas Harshaw (Trinity), Bishop H.H. Brookins and Bishop John Walker of Washington, DC, Archbishop Marino of Atlanta, Rev. Cecil Williams (Glide Memorial of San Francisco) and Bishop Barbara Harris (Suffragan Bishop of the Diocese of Massachusetts) will always be remembered for their contributions to the black community.

Today, there are many black ministers who have become influential political leaders, such as the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, Presidential candidate in 1984 and 1988 and the Honorable Andrew Young, mayor of Atlanta, GA, and former Member of the House of Representatives and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations.

Out of the 24 members of the Congressional Black Caucus 5 of them are ministers—WILLIAM GRAY of Pennsylvania, FLOYD FLAKE and ED TOWNS of New York, JOHN LEWIS of Atlanta, and WALTER FAUNTROY of the District of Columbia.

The black church provides political leverage on the national political arena as well. Both President George Bush and Governor Michael Dukakis visited black churches during the 1988 Presidential campaign to pledge their support for low- and moderate-income housing, urban mass transit, improved health care for seniors and better education for our youth.

I cannot forget the contributions that black churches have made in Los Angeles as well, such as the oldest one: First A.M.E., founded in 1872; Second Baptist Church which is over 103 years old; and Trinity Baptist Church which recently celebrated its 70th year anniversary. In fact, in 1944, Rev. Caston of Trinity led a successful fight to break the restricted residential covenant which barred blacks from owning property in the Arlington District or westside of Los Angeles—an area which is now part of my congressional district. In a successful fight, he laid the foundation for Trinity on Jefferson Boulevard and Cimarron Street.

The church has played a significant role internationally as well. Whether in the back to Africa movement, establishing a colony in Liberia or bringing the independence struggles in Ghana or Zimbabwe in the 1960's to our shores, the church opened its doors. The church is no stranger to the battle against apartheid in South Africa, the liberation struggle by SWAPO in Namibia or the drought in the Sudan and Ethiopia. Nobel Peace Prize Laureate Bishop Desmond Tutu, Rev. Allan Boesak, and Oliver Tambo of the African National Congress have brought the message of the suffering in South Africa to Los Angeles through the churches, and missionaries in this country have contributed to the building of churches overseas. Black churches have raised thousands of dollars to send to developing countries in Africa and the Caribbean.

Mr. Speaker, the black church will continue to be the center for improving the political, economical, and social status of blacks in this country, and our churches will continue to be an important lifeline for blacks throughout the world. I am proud to join my colleagues in recognizing this notable institution that has played such a significant role in the history of this Nation.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VISCLOSKY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

COMMEMORATION OF THE 30TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE TIBETAN NATIONAL UPRISING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROSE] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, in today's Washington Post there is a very excellent editorial about our President's recent visit to China and his invitation of a leading dissident in China, Mr. Fang Lizhi, to a going-away barbecue at the Great Wall Sheraton Hotel which the President had before he left China on Sunday.

The Chinese government prohibited Mr. Fang from accepting that invitation, and the Post has written a very eloquent, excellent editorial commenting on that event and the place that the President holds as a leader of the free world in standing up to civil rights and human rights violations in China. I would like to read from that editorial. I will briefly read from different parts of it. However, at this point in the RECORD I am inserting the entire editorial.

The editorial follows:

MR. FANG'S INVITATION

Diplomatic harmony and good feelings are all very well, but China's leaders drew the line at President Bush's invitation to the dissident Fang Lizhi. Their refusal to allow Mr. Fang to go to the Americans' party in Beijing was a striking rebuff to their visitor, Mr. Bush. It seemed to us that Mr. Bush was much too mild and complaisant in response to it. He should have registered much more strongly and quickly his own displeasure. He should have politely raised hell.

As the incident illustrates, the extraordinary reforms in the Chinese economy are not being balanced by anything similar in the country's political system. The leadership seems to regard one kind of progress as the enemy of the other. The Communist Party's general secretary, Zhao Ziyang, had earlier gone out of his way to deflect Mr. Bush from any mention of human rights by saying that the dissidents were a threat to progress in economic decontrol and decentralization. On that point too we think Mr. Bush should have countered strongly.

In the aftermath of the party that Mr. Fang didn't attend, the Chinese government complained that the embarrassment was entirely the fault of the United States for having invited him without first consulting them. But of course there was more to it than procedure. The party was delivering a double message: to the Chinese people to stay in line and to the Americans to mind their own business.

But the Americans regard human rights as their business and should. Does it sometimes get in the way of commerce and other kinds of international business? No doubt, but that's a price that most Americans have consistently been willing to pay. While China is a country of great importance to the United States, the American concern for human rights is increasingly going to be a factor as the dealings between them expand.

After the party, as he was leaving China, Mr. Bush expressed his regret over the treatment of Mr. Fang to the vice premier who was seeing him off. The president, a spokesman said, prefers to talk about human rights cases in a low key and privately. There's something to be said for that approach in certain (but not all) situations, but only as long as it is not so low-keyed and private that it becomes invisible and only if it does not convey the signal that this country really doesn't care what the offending government does to its own protesters.

In fact, Mr. Fang had a point when he chided the United States for what he called its double standard in dealing far more gently with these issues in China than in the Soviet Union. It is true that Chinese practice has improved immeasurably since the atrocities of the Cultural Revolution. Not a hand was laid on Mr. Fang on Sunday. He was not whisked off by the cops. He remained at liberty to tell the world what had happened. But the Cultural Revolution is not exactly a sterling standard against which to measure progress, and Mr. Fang is living under an authority that remains monolithic. As long as that continues to be true, it will set clear limits on the relations between Mr. Fang's country and Mr. Bush's. The Chinese government leaders need to understand that.

Mr. Speaker, the portion I wish to read is as follows:

Diplomatic harmony and good feelings are all very well, but China's leaders drew the line at President Bush's invitation to the dissident Fang Lizhi. Their refusal to allow Mr. Fang to go to the Americans' party in Beijing was a striking rebuff to their visitor, Mr. Bush. It seemed to us that Mr. Bush was much too mild and complacent in response to it. He should have registered much more strongly and quickly his own displeasure. He should have politely raised hell.

Mr. Speaker, I am here today to talk about the Tibetan situation and the way in which the people of China, the Chinese Communist government, continues to treat the people in the remote region of Tibet, and I have today introduced, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. DOUGLAS], a concurrent resolution commemorating March 10, 1989, as the 30th anniversary of the Tibetan national uprising and expressing the concern of the Congress for the ongoing human rights abuses in Tibet. I include a copy of that resolution at this point in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. 63

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring),

SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) On March 10, 1959, the Chinese People's Liberation Army violently suppressed a national uprising against the Chinese occupation of Tibet.

(2) The ensuing repressive actions by the Chinese resulted in the deaths of more than one million Tibetans, the systematic destruction of Tibet's unique and cultural heritage and the flight of the Dalai Lama and tens of thousands of Tibetans from their homeland.

(3) In 1959, 1961 and 1965 the United Nations passed resolutions condemning the Chinese for the denial of fundamental human rights and freedom in Tibet, including the right to self-determination for the Tibetan people.

(4) In 1960 the International Commission of Jurists published findings that charged the People's Republic of China with genocide in Tibet.

(5) Over the past thirty years, Tibetans have suffered under oppressive rule by the Chinese government.

(6) Recent reports issued by credible human rights organizations, including Asia Watch and Amnesty International, and international press confirm mounting allegations of gross human rights violations in Tibet, including arbitrary arrest and detention, the use of excessive force on peaceful demonstrators, religious persecution and torture.

(7) Tibetans continue to peacefully demonstrate against the oppressive Chinese rule and in support of the Dalai Lama's Five Point Peace Proposal announced to Members of the United States Congress on September 21, 1987.

(8) The Dalai Lama's proposal focussed on the need for earnest and substantive negotiations on the future status of Tibet between representatives of the Tibetan people and China's leadership.

(9) Congress unanimously passed, and President Reagan signed into law, legislation calling on "the Government of the People's Republic of China to actively reciprocate the Dalai Lama's efforts to establish a constructive dialogue on the future of Tibet."

SEC. 2. EXPRESSION OF CONGRESSIONAL CONCERN FOR HUMAN RIGHTS IN TIBET AND SUPPORT FOR THE DALAI LAMA'S EFFORTS TO PEACEFULLY RESOLVE THE ABUSES IN TIBET.

The Congress—

(1) condemns the ongoing human rights abuses committed by the Chinese government in Tibet;

(2) supports the Dalai Lama's efforts to peacefully resolve the tragic situation in Tibet; and

(3) once again, calls upon the Government of the People's Republic of China to actively reciprocate the Dalai Lama's efforts to establish a constructive dialogue on the future of Tibet.

Mr. Speaker, in this resolution we find that on March 10, 1959, the Chinese People's Army violently suppressed the national uprising against Chinese occupation of Tibet, and that the ensuing repressive actions by the Chinese resulted in the deaths of more than 1 million Tibetans, the systematic destruction of Tibet's unique cultural heritage, and the flight of the Dalai Lama and tens of thousands of Tibetans from their homeland.

In 1959, 1961, and 1965, the United Nations passed resolutions condemning the Chinese for the denial of fundamental human rights and freedoms in Tibet, including the right of self-determination for the Tibetan people.

In 1960 the International Commission of Jurists published findings that charged the People's Republic of China with genocide in Tibet. Recent reports issued by credible human-rights organizations including Asia Watch, Amnesty International, and International Press confirmed mounting allegations of gross human-rights violations in Tibet, including arbitrary arrests and detention, the use of excessive force on peaceful demonstrators, religious persecution, and torture.

Mr. Speaker, on September 21, 1987, His Holiness, the Dalai Lama came to the United States and actually held a hearing sponsored by the Human Rights Caucus in the House of Representatives in which he made a five-point peace proposal. That five-point peace proposal was expanded in a speech which His Holiness delivered to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France. I am including those remarks in that proposal at this point in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS OF DALAI LAMA

We are living today in a very interdependent world. One nation's problems can no longer be solved by itself. Without a sense of universal responsibility our very survival is in danger. I have, therefore, always believed in the need for better understanding, closer co-operation and greater respect among the various nations of the world. The European Parliament is an inspiring example. Out of the chaos of war, those who were once enemies have, in a single generation, learned to co-exist and to co-operate. I am, therefore, particularly pleased and honoured to address this gathering at the European Parliament.

As you know, my own country—Tibet—is undergoing a very difficult period. The Tibetans—particularly those who live under Chinese occupation—yearn for freedom and justice and a self-determined future, so that they are able to fully preserve their unique identity and live in peace with their neighbours.

For over a thousand years we Tibetans have adhered to spiritual and environmental values in order to maintain the delicate balance of life across the high plateau on which we live. Inspired by the Buddha's message of non-violence and compassion and protected by our mountains, we sought to respect every form of life and to abandon war as an instrument of national policy.

Our history, dating back more than two thousand years, has been one of independence. At no time, since the founding of our nation in 127 B.C., have we Tibetans conceded our sovereignty to a foreign power. As with all nations; Tibet experienced periods in which our neigbours—Mongol, Manchu, Chinese, British and the Gorkhas of Nepal—sought to establish influence over us. These eras have been brief and the Tibetan people have never accepted them as constituting a loss of our national sovereignty. In fact, there have been occasions when Tibetan rulers conquered vast areas of China and other neighbouring states. This, however, does not mean that we Tibetans can lay claim to these territories.

In 1949, the People's Republic of China forcibly invaded Tibet. Since that time, Tibet has endured the darkest period in its history. More than a million of our people have died as a result of the occupation. Thousands of monasteries were reduced to ruins. A generation has grown up deprived of education, economic opportunity and a sense of its own national character. Though the current Chinese leadership has implemented certain reforms, it is also promoting a massive population transfer onto the Tibetan plateau. This policy has already reduced the six million Tibetans to a minority. Speaking for all Tibetans, I must sadly inform you, our tragedy continues.

I have always urged my people not to resort to violence in their efforts to redress their suffering. Yet I believe all people have the moral right to peacefully protest injustice. Unfortunately, the demonstrations in Tibet have been violently suppressed by the Chinese police and military. I will continue to counsel for non-violence, but unless China forsakes the brutal methods it employs, Tibetans cannot be responsible for a further deterioration in the situation.

Every Tibetan hopes and prays for the full restoration of our nation's independence. Thousands of our people have sacrificed their lives and our whole nation has suffered in this struggle. Even in recent months, Tibetans have bravely sacrificed their lives to achieve this precious goal. On the other hand, the Chinese totally fail to recognize the Tibetan people's aspirations and continue to pursue a policy of brutal suppression.

I have thought for a long time on how to achieve a realistic solution to my nation's plight. My cabinet and I solicited the opinions of many friends and concerned persons. As a result, on September 21, 1987, at the Congressional Human Rights Caucus in Washington, D.C., I announced a Five Point Peace Plan for Tibet. In it I called for the conversion of Tibet into a zone of peace, a sanctuary in which humanity and nature can live together in harmony. I also called for respect for human rights and democratic ideals, environmental protection, and a halt to the Chinese population transfer into Tibet.

The fifth point of the Peace Plan called for earnest negotiations between the Tibetans and the Chinese. We have, therefore, taken the initiative to formulate some thoughts which, we hope, may serve as a basis for resolving the issue of Tibet. I would like to take this opportunity to inform the distinguished gathering here of the main points of our thinking.

The whole of Tibet known as Cholka-Sum (U-Tsang, Kham and Amdo) should become a self-governing democratic political entity founded on law by agreement of the people for the common good and the protection of themselves and their environment, in association with the People's Republic of China.

The Government of the People's Republic of China could remain responsible for Tibet's foreign policy. The Government of Tibet should, however, develop and maintain relations, through its own Foreign Affairs Bureau, in the fields of religion, commerce, education, culture, tourism, science, sports and other non-political activities. Tibet should join international organizations concerned with such activities.

The Government of Tibet should be founded on a constitution or basic law. The basic law should provide for a democratic system of government entrusted with the task of ensuring economic equality, social justice and protection of the environment. This means that the Government of Tibet will have the right to decide on all affairs relating to Tibet and the Tibetans.

As individual freedom is the real source and potential of any society's development, the Government of Tibet would seek to ensure this freedom by full adherence to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, including the rights to speech, assembly, and religion. Because religion constitutes the source of Tibet's national identity, and spiritual values lie at the very heart of Tibet's rich culture, it would be the special duty of the Government of Tibet to safeguard and develop its practice.

The government should be comprised of a popularly elected Chief Executive, a bi-cameral legislative branch, and an independent judicial system. Its seat should be in Lhase.

The social and economic system of Tibet should be determined in accordance with the wishes of the Tibetan people, bearing in mind especially the need to raise the standard of living of the entire population.

The Government of Tibet would pass strict laws to protect wildlife and plantlife. The exploitation of natural resources would be carefully regulated. The manufacture, testing and stockpiling of nuclear weapons and other armaments must be prohibited, as well as the use of nuclear power and other technologies which produce hazardous waste. It would be the Government of Tibet's goal to transform Tibet into our planet's largest natural preserve.

A regional peace conference should be called to ensure that Tibet becomes a genuine sanctuary of peace through demilitarization. Until such a peace conference can be convened and demilitarization and neutralization achieved, China could have the right to maintain a restricted number of military installations in Tibet. These must be solely for defence purposes.

In order to create an atmosphere of trust conducive to fruitful negotiations, the Chinese Government should cease its human rights violations in Tibet and abandon its policy of transferring Chinese to Tibet.

These are the thoughts we have in mind. I am aware that many Tibetan will be disappointed by the moderate stand they represent. Undoubtedly, there will be much discussion in the coming months within our own community, both in Tibet and in exile. This, however, is an essential and invaluable part of any process of change, I believe these thoughts represent the most realistic means by which to re-establish Tibet's separate identity and restore the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people while accommodating China's own interests. I would like to emphasize, however, that whatever the outcome of the negotiations with the Chinese may be, the Tibetan people themselves must be the ultimate deciding authority. Therefore, any proposal will contain a comprehensive procedural plan to ascertain the wishes of the Tibetan people in a nationwide referendum.

I would like to take this opportunity to state that I do not wish to take any active part in the Government of Tibet. Nevertheless, I will continue to work as much as I can for the well-being and happiness of the Tibetan people as long as it is necessary.

We are ready to present a proposal to the Government of the People's Republic of China based on the thoughts I have presented. A negotiating team representing the Tibetan Government has been selected. We are prepared to meet with the Chinese to discuss details of such a proposal aimed at achieving an equitable solution.

We are encouraged by the keen interest being shown in our situation by a growing number of governments and political leaders, including former President Jimmy Carter of the United States. We are also encouraged by the recent changes in China which have brought about a new group of leadership, more pragmatic and liberal.

We urge the Chinese Government and leadership to give serious and substantive consideration to the ideas I have described. Only dialogue and a willingness to look with honesty and clarity at the reality of Tibet can lead to a viable solution. We wish to conduct discussions with the Chinese Government bearing in mind the larger interests of humanity. Our proposal will therefore be made in a spirit of conciliation and we hope that the Chinese will respond accordingly.

My country's unique history and profound spiritual heritage render it ideally suited for fulfilling the role of a sanctuary of peace at the heart of Asia. Its historic status as a neutral buffer state, contributing to the stability of the entire continent, can be restored. Peace and security for Asia as well as for the world at large can be enhanced. In the future, Tibet need no longer be an occupied land, oppressed by force, unproductive and scarred by suffering, it can become a free haven where humanity and nature live in harmonious balance; a creative model for the resolution of tensions afflicting many areas throughout the world.

The Chinese leadership needs to realize that colonial rule over occupied territories is today anachronistic. A genuine union or association can only come about voluntarily, when there is satisfactory benefit to all the parties concerned. The European Community is a clear example of this. On the other hand, even one country or community can break into two or more entities when there is a lack of trust or benefit, and when force is used as the principal means of rule.

I would like to end by making a special appeal to the honourable members of the European Parliament and through them to their respective constituencies to extend their support to our efforts. A resolution of the Tibetan problem within the framework that we propose will not only be for the mutual benefit of the Tibetan and Chinese people but will also contribute to regional and global peace and stability. I thank you for providing me the opportunity to share my thoughts with you.

Mr. Speaker, the Dalia Lama is the spiritual and temporal leader of the Tibetan people and of Tibetan Buddhism. He lives in exile in Dharmsala, India, and in his speech in France, as had been given here in Washington, he proposed a very sensible arrangement for working out the differences between the Chinese and the people of Tibet.

These five points include a transformation of the whole of Tibet into a zone of peace, abandonment of China's population transfer policy, which threatens the very existence of the Tibetans as a people, respect of the Tibetan people's fundamental rights and democratic freedoms, restoration and protection of Tibet's natural environment, and the abandonment of China's use of Tibetan territory for the production of nuclear weapons and the dumping of nuclear waste, and the commencement of earnest and substantive negotiations on the future status of Tibet and of relations between the Tibetan and Chinese peoples.

Mr. Speaker, the Dalai Lama is a great man of peace and he gave this very eloquent speech of his in France. I am very embarrassed to have learned that the President of the European Parliament, Lord Plum, later apologized to the Chinese for ever allowing the Dalai Lama to make these remarks in any way associated with the European Parliament.

Lord Plum said that the European Parliament had angered the Chinese and that the Dalai Lama's remarks got in the way of the European Community's chief objective, which was the establishment of broad economic ties between the Government of China and the European Common Market countries.

The one thing that the Post editorial in today's paper points out very clearly is that economic development certainly is important to all developing countries and industrialized countries of the world.

But Mr. Speaker, human freedom and human dignity so far surpass economic developments in their overall importance to both the United States and to the people of the world that words cannot describe the difference.

I am proud to stand here before the House of Representatives today, in a room where two portraits hang, one of George Washington and the other of the Marquis de Lafayette, for whom my hometown is named, the man who helped us fight a revolution and who went back home to France after the revolution and said of America and our revolution that liberty has found a home, and that home is the United States of America.

The people, the leaders of China, need to know that it is in the tradition of the American Revolution and the tradition of the things that brought America to where it is today that we, the elected representatives of the people, have come here this afternoon and have before me today talked about the progress of blacks in America, a civil-rights struggle, a struggle for human rights that has borne fruit, and that has made great progress, and before them the gentleman from Virginia talking about the plight of refugees in the Sudan. This country and the people's representatives in this country feel very strongly about human rights and about the dignity of individuals wherever they live in this world.

I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], a member of the executive committee of the Human Rights Caucus, for the support that he has given to our efforts to bring the Chinese to a greater understanding of our concern for the human rights violations in Tibet.

I am most happy to yield to the gentleman from New York for any comments he might have.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I commend the gentleman from North Carolina for his leadership role in this issue. His persistance has been critical in bringing world attention to this issue.

On September 21, 1987, the Dalai Lama at the invitation of the U.S. Congress presented before the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, a five-point peace proposal as a basis for resolving the issue of Tibet. This proposal represents a most reasonable basis for negotiations between the Chinese and Tibetans. It was supported by the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

The Dalai Lama called for friendship and cooperation with China despite the fact that the Tibetan culture and Tibetan people have been the victims of Chinese domination and colonization. In formulating this five-point peace proposal, the Dalai Lama has approached the issue from the viewpoint of regional stability and international peace.

The Dalai Lama's peace plan contains five basic components: One, transformation of the whole of Tibet into a zone of peace; two, abandonment of China's population transfer policy which threatens the very existence of the Tibetans as a people; three, respect for the Tibetan people's fundamental human rights and democratic freedoms; four, restoration and protection of Tibet's natural environment and the abandonment of China's use of Tibet for the production of nuclear weapons and dumping of nuclear waste; and five, commencement of earnest negotiations on the future status of Tibet and of relations between the Tibetan and Chinese peoples.

In December 1987, President Reagan signed into law legislation that called attention to human rights violations in Tibet. This act of President Reagan and the initiative of the Congress were in keeping with the highest principles and strongest traditions of the United States to uphold the principles of freedom and justice. It was not directed against the People's Republic of China. Nevertheless the Beijing government rejected the five-point peace proposal of the Dalai Lama as "an attempt to split the motherland" and criticized the United States position as "interfering in China's internal affairs." This response foreclosed any hope of starting meaningful dialog.

On June 15, 1988, the Dalai Lama, in a statement made before members of the European Parliament in Strasbourg, offered that the People's Republic of China could be responsible for Tibet's foreign affairs and that in fact Tibet could be "a self-governing democratic entity" in association with the People's Republic of China. The Dalai Lama was criticized by large groups of the Tibetan people, for what was perceived as an overly conciliatory approach. Again, however, the PRC rejected the Strasbourg statement as a basis for negotiations.

Soon after the Dalai Lama made his statement in Strasbourg, the PRC Embassy in Bern issued a statement saying that the Dalai Lama still had not given up the idea of independence and that the PRC would not tolerate any attempts to "split the motherland". Similar statements were issued by PRC Embassies in Washington and New Delhi and by other high level officials. In the meantime, the Tibetans, still hopeful that the PRC would come to the table, announced the formulation of a negotiating team and indicated that they had worked out sincere details for future negotiations.

The formal PRC response to the Tibetans was issued through their Embassy in New Delhi on September 21, 1988, and its contents were released by the PRC to the press on September 23. The response stated that: One, the PRC does not recognize "Kashag Government"—that is, the Tibetan Government in exile; two, the Strasbourg statement cannot be a basis for negotiations; and three, they were, however, still willing to talk directly with the Dalai Lama.

The PRC's willingness to talk to the Dalai Lama is seen by certain quarters as a major concession. However, this is not so. The PRC has always proclaimed their willingness to talk to the Dalai Lama and "Dalai Lama" only. The reasons behind this is that it is a way of suggesting to the uninformed Western and world public that the whole issue of Tibet is nothing but a problem for an individual whose personal name is "Dalai Lama", not "the" Dalai Lama but "Dalai Lama". The constant use of such derogatory terms such as "Dalai," "Dalai clique," and "bandit Dalai" by the PRC further substantiates this position.

Nevertheless the Tibetan Government in exile still believed that once the process of negotiations began it would be able to make the PRC understand the feelings of the Tibetan people. Accordingly they proposed Geneva—Against recommendations made by congressional leaders who wanted Washington—as the venue for negotiations and the first round of talks to be held in January 1989. It appears that the PRC has now added a new obstacle by objecting to the composition of the negotiating team.

It is evident that the PRC is hoping to gain time so that, once the process of colonization through population transfer into Tibet is complete, any negotiations for the future status of Tibet will become meaningless. Unless there is wider international support for the Dalai Lama's five-point peace proposal the PRC will not come to the negotiating table and the situation in Tibet will continue to worsen. The resolutions in the European Parliament and the German Bundestag came as welcome support; however, there is now a need for concerted international campaign to: One, include Tibet in the United Nations' list of colonial countries so that it will receive the same treatment as all other colonial countries to be freed during the anti-colonial decade; two, gain observer status at the United Nations for the Tibetan Government-in-exile; and three, enable the media to maintain permanent representatives in Tibet.

Conclusion: Many Members of Congress view with grave concern the Dalai Lama's committing himself to the weak position outlined in Strasbourg in order to draw the PRC to the negotiating table. It has often been conveyed to us by sources close to the PRC that before they will agree to sit down with the Tibetans they want the Dalai Lama to publicly state that Tibet has always been an integral part of China. It is safe to assume, given the PRC's past conduct in regard to Tibet, that even this inconceivable position would still not bring them to bargain in good faith.

Accordingly, we wish to express our hope that the international community will join the Congress in its support for the Dalai Lama's five-point peace proposal and that the Dalai Lama make no further concessions, and that he stand firm in regard to the status of Tibet.

I thank the gentleman for yielding and I thank the gentleman for his leadership on this issue.

Mr. ROSE. I want to thank my colleague from New York, the respected senior member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs for his comments and his participation in this special order. His support has been crucial to the success that we have achieved in the House of Representatives in bringing this matter to the attention of our colleagues.

I want to issue a call to all of my colleagues in the House and in the Senate to join us in taking a close look at China's treatment of Tibetans. If you think Hong Kong is going to go off without a hitch in 1997, I would suggest that you take another look at the region, another region that is under the rule of the Chinese, namely Tibet, and ask yourselves some hard and soul-searching questions.

I would hope that I am wrong in this next statement, but it worries me that the Chinese have not responded either to the subtle pressures from the Congress or to the subtle pressures from President George Bush.

George Bush was our Ambassador in China. He was treated shabbily in my opinion in his recent trip to Beijing, and he deserves an apology and an explanation from the Chinese Government as to why he was so treated.

Maybe the Chinese have figured out that dollars are more important than lies to the peoples of the so-called democratic societies of the world. Perhaps the Chinese believe that although we proclaim to be great democracies, we put the almighty dollar in front of our concern for the well-being of people. But I do not believe that; I do not believe that that is what Americans stand for. But maybe the Chinese think so.

I, for one, know that this country does not stand for that and I hope the Chinese do not think that economic progress between our two countries will take the place of their own soul-searching on the issue of human rights and, in turn, that they make progress in increasing the rights of the citizens of that country.

In closing, today I want to put in the RECORD at this point an article from the Washington Post that is probably one of the most disturbing articles that I have ever read in all the years that I have been in the Congress.

The article is as follows:

WITNESS TO CHINA'S SHAME—HOW HUMAN RIGHTS AND FAMILIES SUFFER IN TIBET

(By Blake Kerr)

In choosing to invite prominent Chinese dissident Fang Lizhi to his Beijing banquet today; President Bush is drawing attention to Chinese human-rights violations. If Bush is serious, he should bear in mind the tragic situation in Tibet.

In 1959, China consolidated its military occupation of Tibet. For nearly three decades, that small Himalayan country virtually disappeared from western consciousness. Tibetans, however, continued to demonstrate against the colonization and forced assimilation of their ancient culture, in spite of China's often harsh and repressive response.

Tibetans finally gained the West's attention in 1987. On Sept. 27, Oct. 1 and Oct. 6 of that year, while I was in Tibet to help organize a U.S.-Tibetan medical expedition, I witnessed the demonstrations in Lhasa that made world headlines, confirmed the deaths of six Tibetans who died immediately from gunshot wounds and beatings and treated others in secret.

Since these outbreaks, China has restricted independent travel through Tibet by journalists and denied requests from congressional and international human-rights groups which have sought to investigate reported human-rights violations. China has steadfastly insisted that Tibetans are thriving, despite numerous reports to the contrary by Tibetan refugees, many of whom allege that terrible crimes continue to be committed against their people.

While in Tibet in 1987, for example, I met a woman who said that her baby had been killed by a lethal injection and that she herself had been sterlized against her will at Lhasa's People's Hospital. I was haunted by her story. Last fall, I visited Tibetan exile communities in India to interview recent refugees on this most controversial of allegations against the Chinese: that China's Tibetan birth control policy includes forced abortion, sterilization and even infanticide. All of the Tibetans I interviewed gave detailed accounts of such activity.

A Tibetan doctor named Pema, who worked in a Chinese hospital in Amdo, told me the following story: "There are two types of Chinese birth-control teams, one in the hospitals and another that goes from village to village. Both teams have a monetary incentive to do abortions and sterilizations on as many women as possible. The more names in Chinese doctors collect, the more money they get from their government, and from the women who are charged between 100 and 200 yuan (six months salary) per operation."

Forced abortion and sterilization of Tibetan women were common during the Cultural Revolution but were suspended in the last 1970's. While China denies the forced abortion and sterilization are part of its birth-control policy, a growing number of reports as well as congressional testimony indicate that there is a reason to suspect a resurgence in these practices.

After interviewing Tibetan nurses and doctors who had worked in Chinese and Tibetan hospitals, monks and lay Tibetans who had lived in the cities of Lhasa, Amdo and Kham, I was able to develop a sense of how the Chinese birth-control policy is being applied in Tibet.

According to the reports I collected, mobile teams implement birth-control policy for Tibetans living in small villages and nomad areas of Amdo and Kham. For those women who live near a Chinese hospital, birth control-units in Chinese (not Tibetan) hospitals implement birth-control policy.

At regular meetings, work-unit leaders tell Tibetan women that, while it is legal for Tibetans to have a second child, it is best for Tibetan women to have only one, like the Chinese. Those who agree to sterilization after the birth of their first child are praised. A monetary incentive of 100 yuan and a woolen blanket may also be given at the hospital. Both Chinese and Tibetan women must be married and be between the ages of 25 and 35 to have a child. A Tibetan women who desires a second child must wait for four years before becoming pregnant again. Women who violate these rules are forced to have an abortion, often accompanined by sterilization and economic sanctions.

Sanctions for having a third child are so severe that many Tibetan women choose to have their children at home. Poorer village Tibetans and nomads, who are often unable to pay even a small fine, have livestock or other material possessions confiscated. Couples where one or both parents work in a Chinese organization are fined the most.

Thubten Geshe, a Tibetan physician who practiced at Lhasa's hospital of Tibetan Medicine, gave me the following example: The second child of a friend of his died. When the parents asked for permission to have a third child, this was refused. The women became pregnant anyway and secretly delivered the baby at home during the summer of 1986. When the police discovered this, the parents were fined 3,000 yuan and demoted.

The fines imposed on third children are more severe than those imposed on the parents. Third children have no legal right to attend school, work, travel, own property or receive a ration card. There are thousands of such children in villages. Their economic and social exile is complete and is rapidly producing a generation of illegal children who must collect refuse or dung to earn a living.

Some of the most concerned allegations I learned from the refugees concerned infanticide, the killing of a newborn child. Three women whom I interviewed described how a relative or acquaintance of theirs had delivered a normal baby, only to have the nurse kill it with a lethal injection in the soft spot on the forehead.

A particularly appalling story I heard came from a pair of refugee Buddhist monks, Ngawang Smanla and Tsewang Thonden. "In the autumn of 1987," they told me, "a Chinese birth-control team set up their tent next to our monastery in Amdo. The villagers, were informed that all women had to report to the tent for abortions and sterilizations or there would be grave consequences. For the women who went peacefully to the tents and did not resist, medical care was given. The women who refused were taken by force, operated on, and no medical care was given. Women nine months pregnant had thir babies taken out."

During the two weeks the birth-control tent stood in the village, the monks claimed that all pregnant women had abortions followed by sterilization, and every woman of childbearing age was sterilized. "We saw many girls crying, heard their screams as they waited for their turn to go into the tent, and saw the growing pile of fetuses build outside the tent, which smelled horrible.

"The birth-control teams were initiated in 1982", the monks continued, "but since 1987 there has been a temendous increase in the number and frequency of the teams that move from town to town, and to nomad areas."

Also since 1987, police torture has become routine, according to the refugees. Five of the Tibetans I interviewed stated that specially-trained Chinese torture units brought draconian techniques to Lhasa's prisons in the wake of the demonstrations. One monk named Norbu told me that four of his brother monks had been tortured for demonstrating. "Each monk was stripped naked and beaten with clubs with nails driven through the ends, rifle butts, electric cattle prods and truncheons, until they passed out. Then they would be revived with cold water. Their testicles were crushed."

Tinley, a Tibetan policeman who had worked in Lhasa's predominantly Chinese police force, said that rebellious prisoners are tortured for up to six months, while recalcitrant ones are executed. "If a prisoner is adamant and says that Tibet is independent, then he will be stripped naked and beaten. The police are free to beat the prisoners to death." Tinley described his special methods for breaking joints, and how he beat prisoners using cattle prods, rifle butts and rocks, According to Tinley, "If a prisoner dies during the beatings . . . it is the prisoners' fault."

Are these reports trustworthy? Interviewing indigenous Tibetans would have been preferable to interviewing refugees. Refugee accounts could be fictitious, biased or represent aberrations in Chinese birth-control policy. However, these accounts are both widespread and consistent with accounts from other travelers.

There may be a double tragedy in Tibet's birth-control situation, because it may be misused by those interested only in opposing abortion. In 1985, allegations of coercive abortion and sterilization within China itself prompted the United States to eliminate its $46-million contribution to the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA). UNFPA funding will soon come before Congress again and will doubtless be affected by allegations about Tibet. This would be an exploitation of the Tibetans, whose problems transcend any single issue, at the expense of population-control efforts elsewhere.

The U.S. Congress has condemned China for egregious human-rights violations against Tibetans, a sentiment which has since been expressed by the European Parliament as well. To China, this constitutes meddling in its "internal affairs," it has denied requests from Asis Watch and Amnesty International to investigate violations of Tibetans' human rights.

But to Tibetans, this is a matter of survival. The Reagan administration failed to address human-rights violations in Tibet. To have done so, the Chinese warned, would jeopardize increasing business and military interests. On his first trip to China as president of the United States, George Bush has a remarkable opportunity to stand up for human rights in Tibet before it is too late.

This article, "Witness to China's Shame," is written by Dr. Blake Kerr, a physician who has traveled extensively in Tibet and who met with me this morning here in my office in Washington.

This article talks of human suffering and death in a way that I have only read about in accounts of Nazi Germany's extinction of millions of Jews.

I have never read anything quite like this account of sterlization and infanticide.

I will read a few verses at this point:

While in Tibet in 1987, for example, I met a woman who said that her baby had been killed by a lethal injection and that she herself had been sterilized against her will at Lhasa's People's Hospital. I was haunted by her story. Last fall, I visited Tibetan exile communities in India to interview recent refugees on this most controversial of allegations against the Chinese; that China's Tibetan birth control policy includes forced abortion, sterilization and even infanticide. Both teams have a monetary incentive to do abortions and sterilizations on as many women as possible. They are paid accordingly.

The Tibetans are encouraged to have only one child although, as minorities, they are allowed to have two.

A particularly appalling story I heard came from a pair of refugee Buddhist monks, Ngawang Smanla and Tsewang Thonden. "In the autumn of 1987," they told me, "a Chinese birth-control team set up their tent next to our monastery in Amdo. "We saw many girls crying, heard their screams as they waited for their turns to go into the tent, and saw the growing pile of fetuses build outside the tent, which smelled horrible.

The article goes on:

Some of the most shocking allegations I heard from the refugees concerned infanticide, the killing of a newborn child. Three women whom I interviewed described how a relative or acquaintance of theirs had delivered a normal baby, only to have the nurse kill it with a lethal injection in the soft spot on the forehead.

Now, how many of my colleagues have been to a hospital and have held a newborn baby, have brought a child home and known about the soft spot in the top of their forehead and how precious that life was and how delicate that child had to be treated; can you imagine a government policy that involved the injection of a lethal chemical into the head of a newborn child to perform some kind of birth control and population control in Tibet?

The Chinese Ambassaor to the United States told me at his residence in April or March of last year here in Washington that the economic progress of Tibet only began when China came into the Tibetan region. Tibetans are not allowed to participate in whatever so-called economic development takes place in Tibet.

Tibet is such a sparsely populated area that the Chinese must offer extra payments and other benefits to Chinese nationals to encourage them to live in Tibet.

Yet they practice this kind of inhuman, intolerable cruelty against Tibetan natives.

I do not believe the world will long stand still for a nation, even like China, to perform these kinds of inhuman acts of brutality on anybody, even those that it claims are part of its own country. The Chinese must learn that this is an issue that will not go away. We will not be silent in this country on the issue of Tibet. They can be rude to our President. They can threaten economic retaliation where they think they can, but Americans first and foremost believe in the dignity of the individual and in the rights of all human beings, and certainly we come to the aid of those that are being oppressed as Tibetans are.

Mr. Speaker, in Germany in the Bundestag in Bonn, on April 20 and 21 of this year there will be an International Conference of Tibet sponsored by members of the German Bundestag to bring a greater sense of awareness of the kind of intolerable acts that are taking place in Tibet. I urge my colleagues not only in this Congress but in parliaments around the world to take an active part in prodding the Chinese. The Chinese may not be capable with their kind of leadership, of understanding the size of this problem. It may take far greater wisdom than now recognized in Beijing to work the nation of China out of the predicament that they find themselves in, but my hat is off to the Washington Post for its continued reporting of these matters, and I urge our President, a former Ambassador, to somehow increase rather than decrease his efforts and let the Chinese know that in no uncertain terms we expect them to treat all their peoples with human rights and with dignity.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this special order of Tibet. It is fitting that, as the President returns from meetings with Asian leaders, we reaffirm our commitment to Tibetan cultural independence and human rights. Unfortunately, President Bush chose not to highlight Tibetan human rights abuses in his discussions with Chinese Party Chairman Deng Xiaoping, so Congress must reassert itself on this issue.

We cannot allow human rights abuses to continue in silence, Mr. Speaker. The shooting of Tibetan demonstrators, such as happened on December 10, must not continue. We must not allow the looting of Tibetan monasteries and holy places. We must protect the rich cultural heritage of Tibet by speaking out against the Chinese Government's policy of massive resettlement. Already, Chinese colonists outnumber native Tibetans and the once peaceful Tibetan countryside is occupied by over 300,000 Chinese troops. And we must demand that the desecration of the Tibetan environment be stopped. The Tibetan economy cannot sustain continued clearcutting of forests and soil erosion.

We must make our commitment to Tibetan human and cultural rights absolutely clear to the Chinese Government. I urge my colleagues to support the Rose bill which will be introduced soon. It calls for a United Nations investigation of Tibetan human rights violations; the imposition of sanctions against the People's Republic of China if Tibetan human rights issues are not resolved; the disapproval of international loans and technical assistance to China; and a Presidential commission to investigate environmental conditions in Tibet.

This is a critical time for the Tibetan people. We must redouble our efforts to ensure that Tibetan culture is protected.

REPORT ON MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

SENATE—Tuesday, February 28, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 2:15 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Today's prayer will be offered by the guest chaplain, the Reverend F. Robert Davidson, of St. Christopher's Episcopal Church, Burton, MI. The Reverend Mr. Davidson is also the National Chaplain of the American Legion.

PRAYER

The Reverend F. Robert Davidson offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Almighty God our Heavenly Father, whose great Commandment is that we shall love our neighbors as ourselves, and who has taught us that we should do to others as we would have them do to us, we ask Your blessing upon the Members of the U.S. Senate. Hold before them a vision of Your will for the United States of America which will enlighten the goals they set and the actions they undertake in Your name for us all. Grant them a vision of this Nation fair as it might be in the fulfillment of Your purposes; a nation of justice, where none shall prey upon others; a nation of economic plenty, where poverty and greed shall both be done away; a nation of generosity, where the needs of the less fortunate are met with caring concern; a nation of brotherhood, where success is founded upon service, and where honor is accorded to nobleness alone; a nation of peace, both within and without our borders, where order shall rest not on force but on the love and respect of all for each, and each for everyone; a nation that is both physically and morally strong to meet the challenges we shall face in the days to come.

We ask also, O Lord, that You will grant to these, our Senators, wisdom to perceive Your will for them and the United States of America, courage to lead these people in the direction You would have us to go, and strength to succeed over the many challenges they shall encounter; as You have promised always to be with Your people when they turn to You, our God and Father. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes of my leader time to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE].

THE REVEREND F. ROBERT DAVIDSON

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for yielding for the purpose of my acknowledging the very powerful and inspiring prayer that we have heard today in opening the session by the Reverend Frederick Davidson, who is the pastor of St. Christopher's Episcopal Church in Burton, MI. He has held that post since 1950. That is a 39-year record of extraordinary service in that capacity as the person in charge of that important church in my home State.

Moreover, he has been the chaplain of the Grand Blanc American Legion Post No. 13 for the past 38 years. He served eight times as the Michigan American Legion Chaplain and currently serves as National Chaplain of the American Legion. That is the first time we have been so honored in Michigan, to have one of our number recognized in that way.

We have each day here, as we open our session, a prayer given either by our own Chaplain or by a visiting chaplain. But today, I think is a very special day in having someone who has such a long and distinguished career and who serves so importantly in a variety of capacities within the American Legion, locally and nationally.

I feel a great honor that my good friend, who is really a neighbor from very near Flint, MI, an adjoining community, is here today to open this session of the Senate. I must say that we are very flattered in Michigan that he was chosen for this honor, and we are very pleased that that is the case.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

THE NOMINATION OF DR. LOUIS SULLIVAN TO BE SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as I announced last week in response to several requests by the President to move as expeditiously as possible to consider his Cabinet nominees, it was my intention to take up today the nomination of Dr. Louis Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services.

I was initially advised that a delay of 1 day was requested by a Member of the minority and I was and am prepared to accede to that.

I am now advised that further delay may be requested, and I merely wish to inquire of the distinguished Republican leader with whom I have conversed briefly in private on this whether it will be possible to get an agreement to take up the President's nomination of Dr. Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services today or tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. I first want to thank the distinguished majority leader for trying to expedite the process and I thank him for that. I know the President does.

It would be my hope, too, that the 1-day delay might be adequate. If we cannot get an agreement, I would hope that we could move to the nomination.

I am not taking issue with anyone on this side. But the President has indicated to me personally the need to move these nominations along, and I am hopeful that we can be of assistance.

We have had cooperation from the majority leader and I am sure he expects the same cooperation from the minority leader.

So I am hopeful we can get an agreement.

COMMITTEE FUNDING

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the benefit of all Senators I will state that later this afternoon we will take up Senate Resolution 66 dealing with committee funding.

It is expected that there will be votes during the late afternoon, and Senators should be prepared for that discussion and votes on that.

THE NOMINATION OF DR. LOUIS SULLIVAN TO BE SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Mr. MITCHELL. In addition, in view of the distinguished Republican leader's statements, I will at an appropriate time move to go to the nomination of Dr. Sullivan following consultation with the distinguished Republican leader on the best time and circumstance to proceed to that.

I will simply say that we intend to move forward with Dr. Sullivan's nomination.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

If there is a desire to obtain a reasonable delay, and we can then get a time agreement to take it up tomorrow, I am perfectly prepared to accede to that, but I cannot agree to any suggestion that would indefinitely delay it.

The President has asked my cooperation in that regard, and I pledged to give it to him, and I feel committed to act in accordance with that pledge.

JOINT MEETING OF CONGRESS TO COMMEMORATE THE BICENTENNIAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, I wish to call to their attention the joint meeting of Congress which will occur at 10 a.m. on Thursday, March 2, in the Hall of the House of Representatives. The Senate will convene at 9:15 a.m. and proceed to the House Chamber as a body at 9:45 a.m. This meeting is a major event in the continuing series of programs to celebrate Congress' 200th anniversary.

The featured speaker at the joint meeting will be the distinguished Author David McCullough. Mr. McCullough's book on the creation of the Panama Canal was extensively quoted by both sides during the 1978 Senate debate over the Panama Canal treaties. Mr. McCullough has served as narrator of the Public Broadcasting Service television series "Smithsonian World," and narrated the forthcoming film, "The Congress," in honor of the congressional bicentennial. He was also the keynote speaker at a recent symposium sponsored by the Senate and House Bicentennial Commissions. He is currently writing a biography of Harry S. Truman.

Poet Laureate of the United States Howard Nemerov will read a poem prepared for the occasion. Mr. Nemerov, Consultant in Poetry at the Library of Congress, will be the first American Poet Laureate to speak before Congress. In 1978 he received the National Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize in poetry for his "Collected Poems."

The joint meeting will also feature addresses by congressional leaders. Senator ROBERT BYRD, chairman of the Senate Bicentennial Commission, and Representative LINDY BOGGS, chairwoman of the House Commission on the Bicentenary, will unveil designs for special congressional postage stamps to be issued in honor of the congressional bicentennial.

The U.S. Army Band will perform during the joint meeting.

I urge Senators and their families to attend this significant ceremonial occasion.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST —SENATE RESOLUTION 66

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I now intend to propound a unanimous-consent agreement with respect to the committee funding resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that at 4 p.m. today, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 66, an original resolution providing funding for Senate committees, and that there be 30 minutes of debate on the resolution to be divided equally between the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. FORD, and the Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS, or their designees, and that there be 1 hour equally divided on an amendment to limit the increase in committee funding to 5 percent to be offered by the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. HELMS, and 1 hour equally divided on an amendment to strike section 24 relating to postal patron mail to be offered by the Senator from California, Mr. WILSON; provided further that no further amendments be in order and no motions to recommit be in order and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I might have an amendment to that—I am not sure at this time—on which I would be prepared to take the usual time agreement provided for the other amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the Senator care to identify the subject matter of his amendment?

Mr. CHAFEE. I have not determined I am going to do this, but my thought was to attempt to reduce some of the major amounts for some of the committees. It seems to me it is unfair that some of the committees have such a disproportionate amount of funding compared to the others. I am not sure I can do this, but I would not want to be estopped from doing so. I am not trying to hold up the business here.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will just add to the agreement to make allowance for a possible amendment by the Senator from Rhode Island, if he would like that. And what time would he prefer?

Mr. CHAFEE. The majority leader is saying what—an hour equally divided?

Mr. MITCHELL. For the amendments.

Mr. CHAFEE. That would certainly be more than fair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I believe it would be appropriate if we consulted with the chairman and ranking member of the committee to determine that they will not object to the time agreement proposed by the Senator.

I have no objection. I do not believe the distinguished Republican leader has an objection. But they do not know of the nature of the amendment. If the Senator from Rhode Island would withhold, I will withdraw the proposed agreement and we will then attempt to make certain that there is no objection by the chairman and ranking member of the committee to a time agreement on the amendment as contemplated by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is certainly fair. If I am not here and if they consent obviously that is fine with me. Again if I am not here, I will inform the majority leader what parameters might be agreeable. In other words, if they should want more time, obviously that is acceptable; if they want less time, it could be less time as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

We will then undertake to have the chairman and ranking member contacted following which after consultation with the Republican leader I will propound an agreement altered to incorporate the Senator's possible amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the majority leader is withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield to the Republican leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized under the standing order.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader and I thank the Presiding Officer.

NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. DOLE. I would assume that sometime maybe later today or tomorrow, we would try to reach some agreement on when we are going to take up the Tower nomination. As I understand, the report has not been filed. This is a 48-hour period which can be waived under certain conditions. So I would be hopeful we will discuss that with the distinguished majority leader sometime either today or tomorrow morning.

I would only say in reference to that nomination, as I said at the policy luncheon at noon, sometimes we get so wrapped up in headlines and rumors and innuendos and all these things we forget about there is a personal side to everything we do also.

I received a telegram this morning. I do not want to run around reading telegrams to my colleagues, but I thought this one was worth reading.

It says:

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: We've always admired your forthrightness but never more than now in your defense of our father,

John Tower. Thank you for your unwavering support.

Our warmest regards,

JEANNE TOWER COX.
PENNY TOWER COOK.
MARIAN TOWER.

I recite that to indicate that this is a personal, very personal thing with Senator Tower's family.

We can stand out here and criticize and criticize each other and attack John Tower and attack him as a man and attack his integrity, and spread all kinds of rumors and leak stuff to the Washington Post or some other paper. There was a good leak in there this morning right out of the FBI report. But we ought to stop and think from time to time what we are doing to that person's family when we do that.

And I would guess, unless we can find some way to resolve the dilemma that we find ourselves in, there is going to be a very intense debate on this nomination. I am still, as I have indicated to the majority leader, hopeful that something can be done to satisfy the concerns that some have expressed, the real concerns that some have expressed; not every rumor, not every false rumor, not every accusation that somebody dreams up around here, but the real concerns that some people have.

The President now is back in the country. The President is meeting with Senators in an effort to do what he can to preserve his power as the nominating authority. I hope that we can work out some bipartisan solution. If we cannot, then we are going to have a very, very sharp debate; some of it may be in closed session, some of it may be in open session. Maybe the chairman of the Armed Services Committee is right, maybe we ought to reopen the hearings and bring in the witnesses right out in public view and maybe we will cross-examine those witnesses and find out what the truth is. Because many are determined not to let this nomination go down the drain because of innuendo, and rumor, and falsehoods.

We would expect more if we were the nominee. We would deserve better than that, and so does John Tower and so does anyone else. And so there are some concerns being expressed.

I would just say, as I understand it, S-407 is not being occupied by another group. I hope we can ask them to go elsewhere so that our colleagues can go up into S-407 and take a look at the various documents there. I must say yesterday, all day long, there was a document up in S-407 with no marking on it. It looked like an official committee report, official committee report of all the committee members, which was very anti-Tower. It turned out later it was a majority report put together by the majority. I think it did not really reflect the truth. It was not a summary of the FBI report.

So an agreement was reached last night and today, if that is the case, then they could have another report up on the other side. So today there is the FBI report, there is a statement of facts up there, and there is the so-called Nunn report, which was the one I referred to that was there all day yesterday—and many Senators read that and did not read anything else—and today there is sort of the Warner-Dole report which we believe properly reflects the summary of the FBI report. It is an advocacy document. It would be assumed to be pro-Tower. But it is factual.

And so I would urge my colleagues who only read the one report yesterday to go back and, in fairness to Senator Tower, read the other document, or better yet, read the entire FBI report which, as many know, is 300-some pages long.

But I do understand that we will be on this nomination, depending on the 48-hour provision, sometime this week.

I would say again to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, if there is anything the President can do to allay the concerns that some people have expressed, he is willing to sit down with anyone in this Chamber, John Tower is willing to sit down with anyone in this Chamber, any one of us, ask him any question you wish, and I believe the President and his nominee are prepared to allay the real concerns that some people have.

If you do not like John Tower, we cannot do much about that. If you are already locked in concrete, we cannot do much about that. But we can expect people to look at the facts.

And there have been all kinds of facts published. I have to mention just a couple. The one about the ballerina got a lot of press, on the nightly news; people loved it. Dancing on top of a piano with a ballerina. The trouble is, they never found any ballerina. And the trouble is, the information came from somebody who used four aliases and we are supposed to believe that—and some people do believe that—about John Tower. And his daughters read that story for days and it is not fair to them. It is not fair to him.

And then there is another story about certain allegations about drinking that appeared in the paper, big headlines, somebody saw him at three places. It turned out he was not even in town.

Now, how many Senators believe that? I do not know. But again his daughters got to read it, his family got to read it, his friends got to read it, the American people got to read it. And then they are asked: "Are you for this man?" "Why, certainly not."

So I think we are going to have the facts. It is difficult to get the facts when they are all upstairs in S-407 in the FBI report. Somehow we are going to have to make certain, if we cannot get our colleagues to go up and read both sides, to somehow get the facts out in the open.

But I will say again, as I said to the majority leader, as I said to the chief of staff of the White House last evening, that we have had problems before in the United States. We have come to loggerheads, we have come almost to the breaking point in this Chamber when someone on one side or the other said, "Hold it. Wait a minute. What are we doing to the institution, to the nominee, to the President?"

I am still hopeful that we will work out something that we can go ahead with this nomination and hopefully report it favorably and notify the President that his nominee for Secretary of Defense has been confirmed.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order previously entered, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 4 p.m. today. Senators will be permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

CLEAN AIR ACT SCHEDULE

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, there has been a lot of optimistic talk recently about strong environmental protection. President Bush and EPA Administrator Reilly have promised a more active environmental policy. Members of Congress have expressed hope for renewed bipartisan cooperation.

I believe, therefore, now it is time to roll up our sleeves and get to work. With that in mind, I am today announcing the schedule I plan to follow for consideration of Clean Air Act amendments this year.

As the new chairman of the Subcommittee on Environmental Protection, clean air legislation is my highest priority.

DECLINING AIR QUALITY

It is also a high priority for the American people.

EPA announced earlier this month that an additional 28 areas do not meet the Federal air quality standards for ozone, or smog. Fifteen million people live in these areas. We now have 150 million people living in areas where it is unhealthy just to breathe the air. That is a majority of Americans.

The EPA report also noted that in most of the East the ozone problem was substantially worse in 1988 than 1987. This is not progress.

The adverse effects of ozone exposure are known and they are serious. Even at the current Federal air quality limits for ozone, healthy exercising adults suffer adverse effects from exposure.

Children, who breathe more quickly than adults and have smaller air pathways, are also affected. In fact, last summer many urban areas exceeded the occupational standard for air quality. Our children were playing in air so dirty that it would be illegal for an adult to work while breathing it. This is not progress.

But we can have cleaner air. Most areas can have clean air just by using currently available control measures. But those control measures will not be used unless Congress directs their use. We must pass a law to clean up the air. Only enactment of strong, solid legislation can produce significant improvement in air quality.

SCHEDULE

In order to accomplish this, I am notifying my colleagues today of my plans. Earlier today, I and other members of the Environment and Public Works Committee, so formally notified EPA Administrator William Reilly by letter.

Last year the committee reported a compendium of bills that had been separately introduced. These bills addressed toxic air pollutants, ozone and carbon monoxide nonattainment, and acid rain. I expect to follow a similar procedure this year.

I have scheduled 2 days of hearings in April on health and environmental effects of air pollution.

We will introduce legislation on toxic air pollutants on April 3. While I and Senator BURDICK will be involved in all aspects of the legislation, I have asked Senators LAUTENBERG, DURENBERGER, and BREAUX to focus on this issue.

We will introduce comprehensive nonattainment legislation by May 1, including controls on autos. Senator CHAFEE and I will lead discussions on this issue.

We will introduce acid rain legislation on June 1. Clearly, development of any acid rain bill must rely on the experience and knowledge of our esteemed majority leader, Senator MITCHELL. He and I will work together with other Members to develop an acceptable package.

After all three issues have been addressed, we will hold hearings on the legislation and proceed to markup. I hope to finish markup before the July 4 recess.

S. 1894: LAST YEAR'S BILL

I considered reintroducing last year's legislation. After conferring with my colleagues, I have decided not to reintroduce the bill.

S. 1894, reported by a vote of 14 to 2 by the Environment and Public Works Committee, is a good piece of legislation. But it has come under attack for not being feasible. But I ask: Are the current air pollution levels feasible?

We must enact strong legislation to protect that majority of Americans who are breathing dirty air. My commitment to this goal is as strong as it has always been.

As good as S. 1894 is, this is a new Congress and we have more information about the nature of the air quality problem.

We also have a President who now publicly supports clean air legislation, including acid rain controls. There are changes in the composition of membership of the Environment Committee.

Almost 2 years have passed since much of the original legislation encompassed in S. 1894 was first introduced. Millions more Americans now live in dirty air areas. We found out that "running losses" from motor vehicles can contribute 32 percent more emissions to an area's air quality problem than we previously believed.

These factors must be taken into account. I plan to do so in pressing for significant reductions in emissions of pollutants. A weak bill would at best slow the decline in our air quality; a strong bill, and only a strong bill, improves air quality.

At the same time, we must have a tough bill that is enacted into law. The methods of the past 8 years have not worked. We need a new approach.

I am not interested in broad political statements that do not have the support of a majority of Senators. I will press for a tough bill and ask Members to make tough choices, but I expect to work with my colleagues to address legitimate concerns.

This places a responsibility on other Members to come forward and alert me and other members of the Environment Committee of your concerns. We are prepared to discuss provisions and different approaches, keeping in mind our mandate to protect the public health and the environment.

ACID RAIN

A critical area of negotiation will clearly be acid rain. Senator MITCHELL made a valiant effort last year to reach agreement on this issue. I am hopeful that with his efforts again this year we will finally resolve this longstanding issue.

One of the concerns frequently expressed is the adverse economic consequences of acid rain controls on the Midwest. I am sensitive to these concerns and assure my midwestern colleagues that I have no desire to enact legislation that threatens jobs.

But not only the Midwest would stand to suffer under an Acid Rain Control Program. In Montana, we mine some of the lowest sulfur coal in the country. We are staggering under the weight of a depressed economy and unemployment above the national average.

In the last 5 years, 25,000 people moved out of Montana because there are no jobs available. Our agriculture, mining, oil, and timber industries are all depressed. We should not be penalized by an acid rain approach that sacrifices potential jobs for our miners.

We have installed four scrubbers in Montana to control sulfur dioxide emissions from some of the lowest sulfur coal in the country. We take our mining and our environment seriously.

Low-sulfur coal is an appropriate and inexpensive part of the solution to the acid rain problem and I expect that any compromise will retain an active role for this clean coal.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF MEMBERS

As new subcommittee chairman I am aware that we are continuing, not beginning, the clean air process. I would like to take this moment to thank those who have been in the forefront of the effort to address this issue.

The majority leader, the former subcommittee chairman, will be a tough act to follow. Fortunately for us all he promises to remain active despite his many other pressing duties. I personally look forward to working closely with him. He has set high standards for consideration of both the process and substance of this issue. I hope to uphold those standards.

Our chairman, Senator BURDICK, has been extremely helpful in making reauthorization of the Clean Air Act the Environment Committee's No. 1 priority. Senator BURDICK does not often announce his good deeds, but I would like to publicly acknowledge his help in this instance. Without his commitment our task would be even more difficult.

The senior Senator from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, was in fact the first to introduce acid rain legislation. His pioneering efforts led to the first integrated research program on acid rain. I know that he will continue to lend his wise counsel on this issue as he has in the past and I look forward to it. His appreciation of the science involved will be a valuable contribution to our efforts.

Our new ranking member, Senator CHAFEE, has years of experience in crafting contentious environmental legislation. His landmark work on the Clean Water Act and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act will serve him well as we turn to air pollution.

Our former leader, the President pro tempore, the present Presiding Officer, Senator BYRD, will again play a pivotal role in our acid rain discussions. He has been a strong advocate for his constituents. I look forward to discussing this issue with him and working together to form an acceptable proposal.

And last, but certainly not least, I want to extend an open hand to the assistant Republican leader, Senator

SIMPSON. We share many of the same Western concerns and, I hope, a joint interest in enacting sound clean air legislation. He has spent many hours on this issue and I look forward to working with him again this Congress.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I am optimistic that the 101st Congress will finally break the clean air deadlock. For too long the public has suffered. The task is not an easy one. It will take long hours of work and study. It will take patience and perseverance. It will take a commitment by all Members to resolve this critical public health issue.

I accept the challenge and pledge to take the time and devote the energy to enacting a tough, practical clean air bill this Congress.

I thank the Chair.

CLEAN AIR ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues on the Environment and Public Works Committee to stress the need for immediate action on comprehensive amendments to the Clean Air Act.

In past sessions, our committee made several attempts to make needed changes in the act. Our efforts were greeted with outright opposition from the Reagan administration.

Those years of denial and procrastination have made this task much more difficult. The quality of the Nation's air has deteriorated.

The costs associated with improving our air quality have increased greatly as a result of our inaction during the 1980's. Today, we begin the process of enacting a comprehensive package of Clean Air Act amendments.

Clean Air Act amendments are the No. 1 priority of the committee during the 101st Congress. These amendments will constitute the major environmental vote of this session.

There has been a great deal of discussion concerning global warming in recent months. We can do more to directly address this problem, in the near term, by enacting clean air legislation in this Congress.

As the saying goes, "it takes two to tango." For the first time in nearly a decade, we have an administration which is publicly committed to supporting enactment of a clean air bill.

We have a new Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency who has pledged to work with the Congress in fashioning Clean Air Act amendments. This is a positive starting place.

But there is a long road ahead of us. If we are to enact a comprehensive clean air bill, every region of the country must be part of our deliberations.

Some of the issues concerning acid rain are the most divisive of the clean air debate. I am confident that a solution, which takes into account the circumstances of each region of the country, can be reached.

Any compromise concerning acid rain must be neutral with regard to existing and future coal markets. If we abandon the polluter pays principle to assist the cleanup in the Midwest powerplants, then full credit must be given to those areas which have expended millions of dollars during the past decade for air pollution controls.

The committee is open to suggestions from all Members of the Senate. We intended to complete action on the Clean Air Act amendments during this Congress. I urge other Members to make their views known.

We intend to enact a strong bill which addresses this Nation's serious air pollution problems. We intend to enact a bill which will give the Environmental Protection Agency, and State and local governments a framework to effectively and aggressively deal with this major threat to the Nation's public health. It is time for action. Let us get on with the task.

I urge my colleagues to join with us in this vital effort.

I thank the Chair.

CLEAN AIR AGENDA

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the quality of life and the quality of our environment are inseparable. We have made good progress on the quality of the environment in many areas.

But our progress is being overtaken by events. In 1970, when the first comprehensive Clean Air Act was signed into law, Americans registered 108 million cars and drove 900 billion miles. In 1987, we registered 177 million cars and drove more than 1.7 trillion miles, with no decline in sight.

The U.S. consumes more energy per gross national product than any other developed nation. This means we produce large quantities of sulfur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen, even if consumption were unchanged. Experts now predict that without further mandated reductions, there will be a about a 2-million-ton increase in sulfur dioxide emissions by 2000.

Americans felt the consequences of more cars and inefficient uses of energy last summer.

Health alerts then told residents of urban areas not to exercise, warned older people and those with asthmatic or pulmonary conditions to stay indoors and suggested that small children not play outside.

In the Washington, DC, metropolitan area last summer, 34 days exceeded the occupational standard for air quality. That means it would have been illegal to expose a factory worker to the air Washington residents breathed, and children played in, for over a month last summer.

Recently released EPA data indicates that 15 million more people are exposed to unhealthy levels of ozone than they were before last summer. This means that 150 million Americans are living in areas where it is often unhealthy just to breathe.

The increasing ozone levels affect all areas, including so-called clean areas. At Mount Desert Island on the coast of Maine, where nearly 5 million people come to escape the summer heat of the cities, monitoring stations reported several violations of the Federal air quality standards.

Dr. Morton Lippman, professor of environmental medicine at the New York University Medical Center, warned in July:

> Until recently we had the impression things were improving, but what we see this summer shows us that we are back where we started from.

Dr. Lippman is right and the EPA data confirms this. Despite considerable progress in controlling some forms of air pollution, we must do more.

Paradoxically, there is reason for hope. For we have found that just as neglect of pollution controls means dirtier air, emphasis on those controls can mean cleaner air.

Americans are suffering from a man-made phenomenon that can be controlled by man. We have developed the technologies of control.

We have the resources to apply those technologies. Until now, what we have lacked is the political will to do so. We must now develop that will.

We cannot, with one piece of legislation, reach all the factors that contribute to dirty air. Nor can we expect any remedy to be cost free. We must keep these fundamental facts in mind as we consider legislation.

Air pollution is not just a regional problem, not just an industry problem, not just something that affects people in the Los Angeles basin or the Northeast alone. Air pollution is a national problem. It affects all of America, and all Americans.

Experts from every branch of medical science have told us that breathing dirty air is simply not a matter of discomfort. It impairs the ability of lungs and blood to carry oxygen. It may permanently damage the lungs.

No one has control over the air he or she breathes. No one can control the direction in which pollutants move in the atmosphere. No one can isolate himself from the quality of the air. It is not a matter of choice, or a conscious assumption of risk.

It is an involuntarily imposed health threat, affecting everyone. The universality of the threat dictates that solutions must be broadly based.

A solution that penalized one part of the country, or one segment of industry, would be unfair and unrealistic.

We have an integrated national economy. None of our regions can thrive in isolation, or in opposition to others.

A policy that imposes huge job losses in West Virginia or Ohio or Kentucky or Illinois is no more acceptable than a policy that imposes heavy pollution damage on Maine or Vermont or North Carolina.

We confront this problem together. We must work together to solve it.

I am encouraged that so many of my colleagues acknowledge this fact. And we must acknowledge it as fact: A solution will impose costs on all of us, just as a failure to act imposes damage on all of us.

The issue is no longer how each of us can best avoid our share of these costs. The issue is how to fairly apportion those costs and reduce that damage to the health of Americans and to the American environment.

The American Lung Association estimates that air pollution costs $40 billion each year in medical costs and decreased worker productivity. Agricultural losses are estimated to be between $2 and $5 billion every year. As last summer's air quality data demonstrates, these costs will only increase if we do nothing.

The American Forestry Association recognized this risk when it stated:

* * * the American Forestry Association believes that the risks and costs associated with further delaying additional pollution controls now seem to outweigh the risks and cost associated with action * * * the control program should target the nation as a whole, as the terrestrial and aquatic forest resource impacts from air pollution constitute a national threat.

Of course, it is easier to quantify the cost of equipment than it is to put a price on impaired lung function. This is the crux of the political problem. The cost of prevention and the value of cleaning up pollution are often difficult to determine with precision.

These arguments will be heard again this year, but the urgency of the problem I sincerely believe will override unfounded claims of overwhelming costs.

President Bush has repeatedly stated his personal commitment to cleaner air. He has promised to send us his ideas on legislation. I look forward to reviewing his proposals.

The subcommittee chairman, Senator BAUCUS, has just presented a reasonable schedule for consideration of clean air legislation. I agree with this schedule and will work with Senator BAUCUS and other members of the committee to assure that we meet it. I urge the administration to submit its proposal in a timeframe consistent with this schedule. To this end, we have today sent President Bush a letter informing him of our schedule so that he may be personally aware of it.

The announcement of the clean air schedule today also enables other Senators to have notice that they must make clear their concerns.

We will have a vote on Clean Air Act legislation this Congress.

Each of us has to take the time to work on the issue and to participate in developing this important legislation. There is time for such participation under the schedule laid out by Senator BAUCUS.

The time to act is now, and I hope the Senate will do so.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. CHAFEE, is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, first I would like to pay tribute to the prior speakers—our distinguished majority leader, who has long worked on clean air matters, the distinguished senior Senator from Montana, Senator BAUCUS, who has been active in clean air legislation, and of course the chairman of our full committee, who has given us such excellent leadership, Senator BURDICK, from North Dakota.

Mr. President, I believe the schedule for reauthorization of the Clean Air Act as set out by Senator BAUCUS is a good one. Approving the renewal of this important law by dividing the legislation into separate bills and then going to a marking up on them will enable the committee to proceed in a deliberate and an orderly fashion. The clean air legislation is extremely complicated and we must assure that our work is both thorough and well thought out. To achieve this objective, as has been pointed out, we will hold a series of hearings once the legislation has been introduced. It is imperative, I believe, that we accomplish our work within the timeframe that has been suggested. For those who have not been counting, it has been 11½ years since clean air amendments were enacted into law. That is the last time we passed any clean air legislation—11½ years ago. We are now 7 years late in renewing authorization for air pollution programs, and we are over a year behind the deadline which was established in law for all areas in the country to achieve healthy levels. Over a year ago all of the Nation was meant to be in compliance with these healthy air standards.

This might not be so troubling if existing programs were improving air quality but this plain just is not happening now.

In 1981, the National Committee On Air Quality, the NCAQ, estimated that only 32 counties out of the 3,000-plus in our Nation would fail to meet the ozone health standards by 1987. As they looked ahead to the future, they said that of the 3,000 counties in the United States, only 32 would not meet these standards by 1987. In fact, by 1988, the data shows that not 32 counties but 426 counties are part of nonattainment areas, and over 100 million people live in those counties. There may be only 426 counties that are not in compliance out of the 3,000, but in those 426 counties live nearly half the population of the United States of America.

Similarly, it was projected that all 262 metropolitan areas, with the possible exception of Los Angeles and Denver, would attain the carbon monoxide standards by 1987. In fact, the data shows that two complied. It shows that 50 instead of 2 areas were in noncompliance—not 2 areas but 50 metropolitan areas, which is about one-quarter of all the metropolitan areas. Previously I was talking about ozone standards. That is different from carbon monoxide standards.

These are dry statistics, but we have to remember that the ozone and the carbon monoxide standards were established to protect people's health. That is why we passed them. We had testimony in 1987 before our committee and scientific publications since then have supported the need to bring the pollution levels down to the standards. The pollution levels that were established were not ridiculous ones. They were the correct ones. At pollution levels above the standards a variety of people can be affected. Who are we talking about? We are talking about children. We are talking about adults who do any form of exercise. We are talking about asthmatics. When we are dealing with carbon monoxide, it is especially dangerous for those with health problems.

I ask that I might have such time as I may need to finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, will the Senator simply indicate how much time he will take? That way I will know whether I should return to the office.

Mr. CHAFEE. How about 10 minutes? Is that all right?

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. CHAFEE. Sure.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. I wonder if I could address it to the Chair. We do not have at this point a formal list of speakers. It was just as recognition obtained. But is it not correct that the time for morning business is over at 4 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. The original unanimous consent order called for what period of time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order we are operating under now grants each speaker 5 minutes.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Five minutes. I just want to register my concern that there are so many who want to be heard that if we run substantially beyond that, many of us will not have a chance to talk at all. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. LAUTENBERG. No, there is no objection.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I do not want to keep anybody else. Is there something sacred about 4 o'clock? I see the majority leader is on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, areas that do not retain these health standards are called nonattainment areas. To bring ozone pollution in these areas down to healthy levels, we have to deal with the emissions of hydrocarbons and in some cases the oxides of nitrogen, so-called NO_x. Of course, in carbon monoxide nonattainment areas, most of that concentration of carbon monoxide comes from automobile emissions. That must be reduced. Adverse health effects are also associated with sulfur dioxide-related pollutants.

In 1987, 2 years ago, the Environment and Public Works Committee reported out strong clean air legislation. That bill, S. 1894, was the result of 11 days of hearings, 3 days of markup in the subcommittee, and 7 days of markup in the full committee. Many said the bill was too stringent. Yet in a 1988 report, the Office of Technology Assessment projected that a majority of areas with unhealthy ozone levels would still experience unhealthy air even after we met those measures that were provided for in our legislation. In other words, they were saying the bill did not go far enough.

As I say, there are lots of objections to S. 1894. I believe the distinguished majority leader has touched on this.

So what we are attempting to do this afternoon, and as we proceed along, will be to attempt to increase understanding of the complex issues that this legislation deals with. I believe we have serious air pollution problems in this country, and we have to take strong action. The bill we brought out last year was a good response but not a perfect one. I think there are some key components that we want in the new clean air legislation. First, it must contain improved new controls for motor vehicles to offset the projected growth in emissions from the increase in automobile miles traveled. The majority leader gave us those statistics in his statement.

Among the needed improvements are technologies such as better canisters to control gasoline vapors that contribute to the ozone formation. We have to have tighter requirements to bring down tailpipe emissions such as NO_x that I mentioned before, carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons.

Second, in order to get a handle on ozone nonattainment, stationary sources of hydrocarbons must be more tightly controlled. What are we talking about? We are talking about reductions in hydrocarbon emissions from wood furniture coating operations, from auto body refinishers, from sewage treatment plants, from RCRA-type treatment storage and disposal facilities, and plastic parts coating operations.

The difficult problem facing us is that we have done the easy work and the improvements from now on are going to be more difficult and more costly than they have been in the past.

Third, the legislation must require EPA to take the lead in setting minimum standards for a number of sources of pollution. We believe that minimum Federal standards will assure that the States will not be tempted to compete with each other at the expense of the environment, and the public health.

Fourth, State and local officials must continue to bear the frontline responsibility for air quality.

Fifth, any Clean Air Act revisions must contain provisions to address the serious problem associated with acid rain and its precursor pollutants, sulfur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen.

In the bill last year we called for a reduction of 12 million tons of sulfur dioxide by the year 2000. I think that is the right combination. Maybe that is not what we will accept this year. I do not know.

Finally, emissions of toxic air pollutants continue to be a vexing problem. That is a matter that Senator DURENBERGER will be handling, and I presume will be speaking on today.

Mr. President, I am optimistic that an environmentally strong clean air bill will be passed by the Senate this year. I am particularly encouraged by the commitment of the President in proposing clean air legislation and by the pledge of the EPA Administrator, Mr. William Reilly, to work with Congress to obtain a law.

The need for legislation is clear. The commitment of the leadership in the Senate to enact a bill is strong, and the schedule set out by the Environment and Public Works Committee is designed to bring a good bill before the Senate by year's end.

I want to thank the Chair. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues from the Environment Committee to discuss the committee's consideration of legislation reauthorizing the Federal Clean Air Act.

As I understand the committee's schedule, legislation dealing with air toxics will be introduced on April 1, 1989, followed by the introduction of separate legislation dealing with nonattainment issues, and finally, acid rain control issues, on May 1 and June 1, respectively.

I further understand that hearings on these bills will not begin until after June 1, 1989, after all three bills have been introduced.

Mr. President, this appears to me to be an ambitious approach to these major issues, but I have great hope that the committee can move legislation according to this schedule, while providing ample opportunity for legitimate concerns and views to be presented, and accommodated.

Last summer we saw an unacceptable rise in unhealthy conditions around the country as a result of air pollution. We need to be able to report a bill from the committee that the entire Senate can support, that the Congress can pass and that the President can sign into law.

The American people are demanding that effective and fair Clean Air Act legislation be passed, and that is a realistic and feasible demand.

Last year it was my unfortunate duty to have been one of two members of the Environment Committee to have voted against S. 1894. I did so because I did not feel that that legislation had been given appropriate consideration by the committee.

First of all, it is my recollection that, while the committee had many hearings on the matters contained in S. 1894, there were never hearings on the legislation itself, once drafted.

It is my opinion that the committee would benefit from hearing the views of interested, expert parties on the actual provisions which staff have drafted into legislation.

I do not say this only because I was not happy with the shape of S. 1894, but because I believe direct testimony on actual legislative provisions would have been more helpful to me personally, as I assume they also would have been to other members who were not able to attend every meeting of the committee.

The schedule outlined by my colleagues here this afternoon seems to afford that opportunity.

Second, Mr. President, it is my opinion that the committee-reported legislation did not reflect a position which the Senate as a whole could embrace. The progress that S. 1894 made—or did not make—after being reported from committee is testimony to that fact.

Further, the final form of S. 1894—or of Clean Air Act legislation last year—was negotiated by a handful of Senators. Other Senators were left watching and wondering what the shape of such legislation might be, and wondering whether they would have the opportunity to have their concerns and the concerns of the States they represent addressed.

That feeling is not an easy feeling to have, especially when it comes right at the end of a Congress, when legislation often passes quickly.

Mr. President, my colleagues have outlined an ambitious schedule here, but it is one that can be built upon.

The major concern that I have at this point is where exactly this schedule leaves President Bush's Clean Air Act proposal.

As my colleagues know, President Bush has promised to submit and press for enactment of a major Clean Air Act reauthorization. I would hope that my colleagues would be mindful that we have a great opportunity to work in concert with the administration to strengthen America's clean air laws. I think we ought not squander that opportunity.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that I want to to vote for a clean air bill this year. But I want that bill to reflect a realistic, reasonable approach to our air problems. I also want to make sure that that approach does not unfairly penalize one region of the country over another, or, give an undue market advantage to one type of coal over another, or one technique for achieving reductions in pollutants over another.

We are on a good path here, and I commend my colleagues for moving toward action on clean air. I hope to be able to cast an "aye" vote in support of an effective and fair Clean Air Act reauthorization bill.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I would like to commend Senator BAUCUS, Senator MITCHELL, and the other members of our committee for the dedication they have shown to this issue, because dedication is what has been needed. Clean air is a subject that has required real staying power.

The year 1977 was my first year in the Senate and as a member of the newly titled Committee on Environment and Public Works. This was the year when we last amended the Clean Air Act, and it seems we have been trying to repeat that feat ever since. The 101st Congress will mark the successful culmination of this decade long effort.

I would take just a few moments to set out some of my priorities with regard to the clean air bill our committee will be considering in the coming months. First and foremost for me, as well as for the State of New York, is the matter of acid rain. I have been involved with this issue since entering the Senate and hope to see it through.

The only Federal acid rain legislation ever enacted is the Acid Precipitation Act of 1980, which I first introduced on September 14, 1979. This bill, which passed in 1980 as part of the Energy Security Act, created the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program, commonly known as NAPAP. NAPAP's 10-year research and assessment program will spend nearly $400 million over its 10-year life. It is now nearing its end, and the monitoring and research it has supported have been vital to our understanding of the acid deposition phenomenon.

We now have a very respectable data base. Our strong suspicions of the late 1970's, that lakes, streams and forests were being damaged by acid rain, are now well recognized facts. We know what areas are being damaged, and we know where the insult originates. The only question that remains open is what to do about it.

I can guarantee that the bill reported by our committee will contain strong acid rain provisions.

The other area of major concern for me is urban air pollution—smog. The EPA's latest data rank New York as having the fourth highest levels of urban ozone in the Nation. Inhalation of ozone has been shown to cause reduced lung function in the short term, and microscopic lesions on the surface of the lung over longer periods.

A large part of any program to reduce levels of ozone and carbon monoxide in urban areas must be tighter controls on automobile emissions. The automobile manufacturers have made impressive progress in reducing car emissions, although this progress has always been at the mandate of Congress. It appears to be time once more to ask them for another effort.

Despite the advances that have been made, the explosive growth in the number of cars on the road is threatening to offset much of what has been accomplished. Presently applicable auto emission standards have succeeded in eliminating 95 percent of hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide from auto exhaust, but this will not be enough. At present, 50 percent of urban ozone and 90 percent of carbon monoxide results from pollution emitted by cars and trucks. Any solution to the problems of urban air pollution cannot exclude this very large part of the problem.

Mr. President, I look forward to a productive effort by our committee this year, and recommend that all Senators begin to prepare themselves to consider this issue.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Republican leader and the distinguished Senator from North Carolina who have agreed to consent to a unanimous-consent request which I am about to propound regarding the nomination of Dr. Sullivan. And I will now propound that request.

Mr. President, as if in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, March 1, at 12 noon, the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Louis W. Sullivan, to be Secretary of Health and Human Services, under a time agreement of 1 hour equally divided between the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], or their designees; provided that no motions be in order and, that at 1 p.m., the Senate proceed without any intervening business to a 15-minute vote on the nomination.

Provided further, that upon the disposition of the nomination the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, and that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR YEAS AND NAYS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that it be in order to request the yeas and nays on the Sullivan nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Sullivan nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BREAUX addressed the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, may I yield to the Senator from Louisiana with the request that momentarily we may have another unanimous-consent request if we could interrupt?

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 4 p.m. today, the Senate proceed to consideration of Senate Resolution 66, an original resolution providing funding for Senate committees; and that there be 30 minutes of debate on the resolution to be equally divided between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD] and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] or their designees; and that there be 1 hour equally divided on an amendment to limit the increase in committee funding to 5 percent to be offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS]; and that there be an additional 15 minutes on that amendment to be used by Senator CHAFEE or his designee; and that there be 1 hour equally divided on an amendment to strike section 24 relating to postal patron mail to be offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON]; provided that no further amendments be in order; that no motions to recommit be in order; and, that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

CLEAN AIR ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I first want to commend all the member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, including our distinguished chairman of the full committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], and both subcommittee chairman who are here on the floor this afternoon—Senator LAUTENBERG, who has been very active in this area, as well as Senator BAUCUS, the new chairman of the Environmental Protection Subcommittee. I commend them for their contribution to the discussion we have had on clean air.

There is no question that there is a crying need for Congress to respond to what is indeed a national concern and a national crisis with regard to the quality of the air we breathe.

There is a joke that says some people in America do not trust the air they breathe unless they can see it. That is a sad commentary on the air quality conditions of many parts of the United States. We have cities where our citizens cannot see above a certain level because of a cloud of noxious substances that layer the areas in which we live.

At the same time, despite the tremendous concern that Americans are expressing about the quality of the air that we breathe and the need for us to do something about it, the fact simply remains that we have not been able to do so.

It is appropriate, but a little unusual, I guess, that we stand on the Senate floor and discuss this issue among ourselves. We need to broaden that dialog. We need to talk with those who have opposed efforts to come up with a clean air bill, to try to bring them in, try to bring in the various constituent groups out there in America that have different opinions on the subject, in order that we may negotiate a bill that would be reasonable. I will predict, as I did last year, that until we bring in under the umbrella of discussion all the various points of view, we are not going to be successful in adopting any major amendments to the Clean Air Act.

We have been unable, despite the seriousness of this issue that cries for action, to amend the existing clean air law with a set of amendments that are rational, reasonable, balanced in their approach, in order to get something over to the President for him to sign. It is critical that we do that this year. It is critical that at least we do it in this Congress.

I am delighted that our new President, a person for whom I have a great deal of admiration in many, many areas, has agreed to be forthright and forthcoming in recommending amendments to the Clean Air Act. His new Administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency, Mr. Bill Reilly, has told me that he plans to support legislation to amend the Clean Air Act.

That is a far different situation from the one we had last year, in which the administration basically sat on its hands and refused to participate in the process. I have said time and again that a clean air bill will not be successful if it is written totally by industry representatives, nor will it be successful in becoming law if it is written totally by environmental concerns, without interaction and without discussion and without compromise among the various groups.

We can say anything we want on the Senate floor, but until we have legislation which brings together these conflicting interests, we are not going to be successful in getting a clean air bill adopted by the Senate and the other body and one that will be signed by the President.

There will be numerous areas in which we are going to have to compromise; otherwise, we will fail once again. We can no longer afford to fail in trying to find the solutions for such serious problems. So I welcome this discussion. We need to broaden it, and we need to have more people involved in seeking answers to these very serious problems.

We in the Congress have a very difficult job in coming up with specific standards. I do not know whether a standard should be 0.009 or perhaps 0.008 when we talk about standards for emissions of a particular compound. Congress should not make those judgments. I would like to have legislation that directs the Environmental Protection Agency to follow through in establishing what those specific standards should be. The legislation should set out goals for what we hope to accomplish, a timetable, and see to it that we ensure that EPA comes through and does what they in fact are supposed to do to achieve those goals.

I doubt that our committee is equipped or knowledgeable enough to come out with the specific numbers that are needed and appropriate to clean up America's air. So we will have to set out a general set of principles and assure the American public that the EPA will in fact follow through aggressively with what they are to do.

I certainly hope that is what is going to happen this year. I am certainly committed to contributing to that process this year. I urge all Senators to join us in that effort.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, to live is to breathe, an instinctual act which we perform unconsciously except for those times when the necessity of this act is brought dramatically to our attention. On a cool February day in Washington, DC we are slow to remember the dreadful summer of 1988 when the people of this city were brought to a painful awareness of the relationship between life, health, and the air we breathe. During July and August of that year, if Washington, DC had been a factory it would have been shut down and the workers sent home because the air pollution exceeded occupational health standards for 34 days. Similarly, residents of my home State of Connecticut face unacceptable levels of acid rain and ozone pollution, not of their making. In the summer of 1987 EPA data indicated that Connecticut had a dozen days of ozone pollution emergency conditions. When compiled, the data for the summer of 1988 are expected to be much worse.

Acid rain is a problem which not only affects trees and lakes but threatens human health as well. According to testimony summarized in the Environment and Public Works Committee 1987 Report on the Clean Air Standards Attainment Act, acid rain is responsible for 50-70,000 premature deaths each year. We spend an estimated $40 billion each year in additional health care costs because of air pollution. Canadian studies, conducted over the last 14 years, have shown that hospital admissions for respiratory problem go up with increases in sulphate and ozone levels. It is particularly infuriating that a large portion of this burden falls on those who are least able to protect themselves—our newborn, young children, and the elderly.

We must have strong clean air legislation and, we must have it soon.

The President has said that he will send us a clean air bill. That itself is a milestone because, after 8 years of inaction we have an administration which recognizes that we are facing a real threat from our air. The test however, will be whether the administration bill is a strong one, that will move us forward along the difficult and complicated path before us. If it is, then we can cooperate on the critical task of cleaning our air so that we, and our families can live healthier and longer lives.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues in thanking the distinguished majority leader, the chairman of the Environment Committee, Mr. BURDICK, and the chairman of the Environmental Protection Subcommittee, Mr. BAUCUS for their comments today on the vital importance of advancing clean air legislation this year.

Although we fell disappointingly short of an agreement on a clean air agreement last year, Senator MITCHELL and other Senators put forth a tremendous effort to forge a compromise in an enormously difficult situation. I am greatly encouraged that the leadership will be making achievement of clean air legislation a major priority for 1989.

As the majority leader and several of my colleagues have pointed out ahead of me today, we have very significant problems with ozone depletion and carbon monoxide pollution in cities all across the United States, from the famous smog of Los Angeles to the brown cloud of Denver.

There are three principal air pollution problems in Colorado and across the Nation:

The first is carbon monoxide pollution, which is a serious problem in high-altitude cities across the West.

The second is ozone pollution. Ozone, which is formed by the interaction of nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons in the atmosphere, is a problem that affects many of the Nation's major urban areas. What is of even greater concern is that the EPA already has determined that the current ozone standard provides little, if any, margin of safety.

And third, dozens of cities and towns across the country are trying to find ways to reduce particulate pollution, which can cause very serious health risks.

The Environmental Protection Agency reported earlier this month that the Nation suffered the worst pollution of the decade last summer. About two-thirds of the more than 300 monitoring stations posted higher levels of ozone pollution in 1988 than in any other summer this decade, according to the EPA's preliminary findings.

Another EPA study recently found that 15 million more people were subjected to unhealthy air in 1988 than in 1987, bringing the total to 150 million Americans who live in areas with higher levels of ozone or carbon monoxide pollution than what is considered safe.

Air pollution can also have disastrous effects on agriculture. A third EPA study suggests that high ozone levels can reduce grain crop yields by as much as 30 percent. The cost to farmers is estimated at between $2.5 billion and $3 billion a year. High ozone concentrations are common in rural areas downwind from large polluted cities.

These problems are first and foremost caused by the automobile and the pollutants emitted by automobile engines: carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxide. We know that the technology is available and affordable to control emissions from mobile sources. We know how to lower the nitrogen oxide standard and the carbon monoxide standard. We know how to test these automobiles so they are able to meet tough standards for the life of the automobile or 100,000 miles.

The question is: When will we find the political will to assure that automobiles, light trucks and diesels meet the standards necessary to protect the health of the American public?

If we look at the longer term problem of global warming, the urgency for action becomes even more acute. Today around the globe, there are 300 million automobiles. Shortly into the 21st century, there will be 1 billion automobiles. Those automobiles are adding significantly day in and day out to the pollution of the air, and to the phenomena of global warming.

As a nation, we cannot afford to delay action on these air pollution problems one day longer. Carbon monoxide, ozone, and particulates all pose very serious risks to the health of literally millions of people. The time for action has come. I believe that there are several specific actions we must take to clean up air pollution in the West's high-altitude towns and cities, as well as in the Nation's major urban areas.

First, to reduce both carbon monoxide and ozone pollution, we should require that auto manufacturers stand behind the pollution-control equipment they install on cars and light trucks. We should insist that vehicles meet current emission standards for the life of that vehicle—for 10 years or 100,000 miles. The Colorado Department of Health has told me that this one measure would do more to clean the air in the Denver metro area than any other single piece of legislation.

Beyond that, we should reduce the amount of pollution spewed from the tailpipes of new cars and trucks. For example, many cars emit far more carbon monoxide when the engines are cold than when the engines and pollution control equipment have warmed up. This one loophole in existing law is causing air pollution problems in cities as diverse as Anchorage and Denver, and we should close that loophole.

Another loophole we should close is the one that permits light trucks sold at high altitude cities to meet a much weaker carbon monoxide emission standard than other light duty trucks. The engines in these trucks are identical to engines in many small cars—and all of them could meet the same standard with only a small modification in the onboard computers. We should make sure that loophole gets closed so that the people of Denver can breathe easier.

In addition, EPA several years ago stopped doing in-use testing for cars and trucks that are used at high altitudes. That means we just don't know whether cars are even meeting the existing standards. We should make sure that EPA restarts its high-altitude testing program so that we can make sure that cars meet the air pollution standards while the cars are on the road, not just while the cars are in the lab.

Mr. President, these are the most important steps we must take to reduce carbon monoxide pollution. In the areas of ozone pollution, it is important that we strengthen emission standards for nitrogen oxides. The same is true of particulate emissions—since buses and trucks are major sources of small particulate pollution, it is very important that we clean up these sources and search for alternative fuels for these vehicles.

Mr. President, reauthorizing and strengthening the Clean Air Act must be one of our top priorities this year, and I am delighted the majority leader and Environment Committee leadership have underscored today their commitment to advancing this vital legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, once again, members of the Environment and Public Works Committee are on the floor talking about clean air legislation. It is a disturbingly familiar refrain of dirty air, sick children, sterile lakes, and dead trees. I am disappointed and embarrassed that Congress has been unable, or unwilling, to enact legislation to reduce pollutants which damage our environment and threaten our health.

Four years ago, New Hampshire enacted a law requiring a reduction in emissions of acid rain precursors in an attempt to slow the degradation which is poisoning the lakes and contributing to the decline of the red spruce and other trees in the White Mountains. My constituents join a chorus of citizens throughout the country who beseech their Congressmen to enact strong air pollution controls.

Congress must take action against acid rain and other air pollutants. Given President Bush's support and the majority leader's commitment to effecting acid rain controls, I believe we can navigate the sea of factionalism and special interests which has impeded enactment of legislation to reduce acid rain. We must work together to create legislation which can withstand political and regional pressures.

Mr. President, first and foremost, legislation must require a significant reduction in the emission and transport of sulfur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen which create the acid deposition damaging the environment and increasing public health risks. We have the ability to reduce emissions now. I will continue to support legislation which results in achievement of immediate emission reductions while allowing a longer timeframe for achieving larger reductions upwards of 10 million tons of SO_2 per year.

I believe that free choice of reduction strategy and use of conservation are essential elements of acid rain legislation. In requiring that they achieve stringent aggregate levels of emissions reduction, we should allow States flexibility to create a least-cost control strategy which fits their particular needs. For, in order to overcome the disparate regional interests and enact strong legislation which adequately reduces harmful pollutants, we must seek to minimize costs.

Incentives should be provided for use of conservation to achieve emission reduction goals. Use of conservation simultaneously decreases emissions, costs, and dependence on imported sources of energy. Conservation measures are superior to other control strategies in that they reduce emissions of other pollutants such as carbon dioxide which contribute to the greenhouse effect.

Mr. President, as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, I will be working hard to sort out the complexities and enact comprehensive legislation to improve and refine the outdated Clean Air Act. I look forward to working with the other members of the committee and urge my colleagues to join our efforts to reduce the harmful effects of acid rain and other air pollutants.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I appreciate this opportunity to join the committee leaders in announcing this timetable for bringing Clean Air Act amendments to the floor of the Senate for consideration.

Like others who have spoken here before me, I look forward to a fair and timely resolution of the many issues that have stalled passage of a bill to renew the now-expired Clean Air Act. The people in my home State of Vermont have a hard time understanding our difficulties in enacting a bill to strip the air and clouds of the sulfur and nitrogen oxide that continue to cause visible damage to our lakes and forests. Today we state that we will address this concern.

Clearly acid rain is Vermont's biggest concern, but this committee bill will go much further than that. It shouldn't take another summer like last year's to convince Members that changes in the current law are warranted.

While we can appreciate the progress accomplished by the 1972 bill and the 1977 amendments, we must realize that increases in fuel consumption, power generation, and industrial activity have offset a substantial portion of the gains realized by mandated standards and design improvements.

The goal of this committee is to put in place the necessary legislation to guarantee healthy air for all of America, and to do so in the most cost effective manner possible. Recognizing past gains, we must finish the job of cleaning the air for future generations.

No one who is witnessing these announcements by the committee leaders should think that today marks a beginning. If anything, today's announcements signal the bell lap for clean air legislation. A large community, including legislators, researchers, and environmental and industry leaders, has labored long and hard to bring us to this point today. This Senate Environment Committee, including past and present members, has logged countless hours seeking to describe the right mix of remedies for the pending malady. Even as the process continues daily, today we set a goal for completion.

I think it is important to realize that not only will the health of air in the United States be improved by passage of an effective clean air amendments bill, but other nations facing similar, or even much worse, problems will benefit by our action. New legislation will spur new techniques and technologies that can be shared with the rest of the world.

The environment can no longer be viewed in local or national terms. We face problems that recognize no political boundaries; problems whose solutions require international cooperation.

By proving to the rest of the world that we can fix our toughest national problems, we will gain a measure of respect that will prove invaluable in addressing difficult global problems. It is arrogant for this country to assume that any other nation will attend to our suggestions for its policies if we are unable to amend our own.

Passage of a Clean Air Act amendments bill is crucial for us, as legislators, to guarantee clean air for our citizens. It is a vital first step that we, as Americans, must take to be credible participants in discussions to solve global dilemmas that loom even larger.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLEAN AIR LEGISLATION

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I want to begin by saying how much I appreciate the schedule which the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS] has outlined. It clearly demonstrates that Clean Air legislation will be a high priority in this Congress. It gives us the opportunity to craft good legislation after wide consultation with affected interests and elected officials from all regions of the country. Starting with a commitment to listen to the broadest expression of concern on these very complex questions is in my view the wisest course.

Acid rain has been of major concern to my constituents in Minnesota for most of this decade. The northeastern portion of our State which contains some of the most beautiful wilderness resources in the Nation is an area extremely sensitive to acid deposition. So Minnesota, acting on its own, has already established an aggressive program to reduce the pollutants which can cause damage to our lakes and forests.

Sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides, the two pollutants which cause the acid rain problem, are propelled into the atmosphere by smokestacks and tailpipes all across America. The yearly loading for each of these pollutants is approximately 20 million tons. The sulfur dioxide comes principally from electric powerplants burning coal. The nitrogen dioxides are about half from industry and half from our cars and trucks.

These pollutants can travel hundreds of miles from their point of release to the place where they affect the environment. Tall smokestacks designed to protect public health in areas close to powerplants have made these pollutants a major issue on a continental scale. It is the issue that divides us most frequently from our best friend in the community of nations. The sensitive resources of our Canadian friends to the north are being ravaged by pollutants produced in our industrial heartland.

As we all know, acid rain is an issue which excites sharp regional passions. The Northeast is the area of the country which suffers most of the damage. The industrial Midwest mines and burns the high sulfur coal which is causing most of the damage. And the West has abundant supplies of low sulfur coal which it would very much like to sell as part of the solution. That mix of interests has meant deadlock here in the Congress for almost a decade.

As I have said, Minnesota has had an aggressive acid rain control program in place for a number of years. Our consumers have spent hundreds of millions of dollars to purchase scrubbers for our powerplants and low sulfur coal as a fuel. But we are also willing to make some further contribution to solving this national problem, if we can. I believe that Minnesotans would support a subsidy for the very high cost of cleaning up powerplants in the Midwest. The people of my State would be willing to pay a fee that was reasonable and gave them some credit for their past efforts, if that fee could break the acid rain deadlock here in the Congress.

In the past I have sponsored acid rain bills which included a tax on sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions. The revenues from these fees were to be placed in a national trust fund to be used to offset a substantial portion of the capital cost for reducing acid rain. My Minnesota colleague, Congressman GERRY SIKORSKI, has been the primary author of bills in the House which would impose a fee on electricity use to provide revenue for an acid rain control subsidy. I continue to believe that some form of subsidy will be a necessary part of any strong acid rain bill.

Clean air legislation must also address the difficult problem of nonattainment. Under the Clean Air Act, EPA has set standards to protect the public health from a handful of pollutants which cause a widespread threat. These are pollutants like sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides. Standards have also been set for ozone—which to most people is smog—and carbon monoxide—a pollutant which comes principally from the tailpipe of cars. These are city problems, generally. More than 100 million Americans live in cities which do not meet the Federal health standards for smog and carbon monoxide.

Back in 1970 when the Clean Air Act was passed, two strategies were developed for smog and carbon monoxide. Since much of the problem is attributable to cars and trucks, EPA was to set air pollution standards for vehicles. And the second part of strategy relied on the States to develop plans for controlling emissions from industrial sources in areas where the standards were being exceeded.

The Federal Motor Vehicle Control Program—as the strategy for cars and trucks is called—has been a great success. Carbon monoxide emissions from the tailpipes of new cars are about 90 percent lower than emissions from cars that were manufactured in 1970. Hydrocarbon emissions—that is generally gasoline vapors—which are the primary element in smog formation have also been reduced by about 90 percent. Another pollutant contributing to smog—the nitrogen oxides—have also been reduced by about 75 percent. As we prepare to review the Clean Air Act, I think we must keep in mind how much progress has actually been made in controlling emissions from the automobile.

There is more that can be done, of course. One of the difficult remaining problems on carbon monoxide is high emissions during the cold weather months. Minneapolis and St. Paul, as one might expect, have a cold weather carbon monoxide problem and are in nonattainment for this pollutant. Engines and pollution control systems just don't function as effectively when the car is started on a cold winter morning. There is no reason to believe that modifications in auto pollution control can be made which will contribute to a further substantial reduction in the carbon monoxide nonattainment problem.

On the ozone side, the biggest difference we can make in the motor vehicle contribution to the air pollution problem is a matter of the fuel rather than the car itself. Gasoline is not a simple compound. It is made up of many different chemical elements. And the mix has changed over the years. As oil markets changed some chemicals available in abundant amounts have become much cheaper than others. For instance, butane is much cheaper than gasoline and can be added to gasoline in large quantities without greatly reducing the performance of the fuel. But butane—as everyone who has flicked a Bic lighter knows—produces much more vapor than gasoline. As oil refiners have added butane to motor fuels, more hydrocarbon vapors have been released to the atmosphere to cause smog and other pollution problems. Controlling the quality of the fuel—a quality called vapor pressure—must be an essential element of our ozone program.

So, we have made great strides on the mobile source side of the nonattainment question, but more can be done. The same cannot be said for the other half of this process, the State planning effort. The original 1970 statute gave the States 3 years to write and implement plans that would assure attainment of the public health standards. When large numbers of areas still had not attained healthy air by 1977, the Congress enacted sweeping amendments to the law that gave States up to 10 more years, to December 1987. That deadline has now passed and the failure to meet standards is still a critical problem in dozens of cities. We have made some progress. The number of days when the air is unhealthy have been fewer in this decade. For many of the cities with the worst population problem, the highest levels of pollution have been brought down dramatically. And a substantial number of cities have actually attained the ozone and carbon monoxide standards.

But these modest successes are not the major theme in this story. Anyone making an objective report on the State planning process of the Clean Air Act must say that the efforts have largely failed to produce results. Many of the control strategies promised in State implementation plans have never been implemented or were implemented in only a half-hearted way. After dozens of cities missed a 1982 deadline, EPA attempted to impose sanctions and was forced to back down by the Congress. All of these cities were required to submit new SIP's, but EPA has never reviewed them. Ironically, the only cities which are now being sanctioned are those who refused to cheat in the planning process at an earlier stage. And now that the final deadline has passed, it is pretty clear that EPA has no legal authority to proceed in any reasonable way to make further progress on the ozone and carbon monoxide nonattainment problem. This is a program that is broke.

And simply repeating the same old cycle one more time—even if we all promise to be serious this time—is not going to solve the problem. To some extent the planning process invites failure. A State implementation plan is a promise to achieve a healthy air quality at some distant date 5 or 10 years in the future. To support the promise the plan must make all sorts of assumptions. Emissions of air pollutants must be projected years into the future. Planners tend to underestimate growth so that emissions will be lower. If emissions are too high to project attainment, control strategies must be proposed. Planners tend to greatly overestimate the efficacy of these control strategies. And the promised strategies must be implemented. Politicians find ways to delay and deflect these control strategies when the time for implementation arrives.

I suppose that with enough resources for oversight, we could make this process honest. We could force this process to produce SIP's that were realistic. But those resources aren't in sight. I believe that fundamental reforms in the process might be more promising. One of the avenues which deserves serious exploration is the proposal made by EPA in its post-1987 nonattainment strategy. Rather than require a demonstration of attainment at some distant point, EPA's strategy relied primarily on an annual percentage reduction in the emissions of pollutants which are causing nonattainment. A percentage reduction requirement ties the whole process to an emissions inventory which is more tangible than the models of future air quality which have been at the heart of the planning process in the past.

The third major issue in this legislation is toxic air pollutants. Most of the air toxics discussion focuses on cancer. EPA estimates that something like 2,500 cancers are caused each year in the United States as the result of toxic air emissions.

Well, you might say that is a relatively small problem compared to other environmental risks or health problems which result from careless lifestyles; 2,500 cancers in a population of 250 million is a 1-in-100,000 risk which to some is an acceptable price to pay for an industrial society. And if the risks were spread evenly among the whole of the population with each of us bearing an equally small portion, perhaps air toxics wouldn't be on the congressional agenda.

But risks are not spread evenly. Those living near point sources of industrial emissions may face very high cancer risks. The 1 in 1,000 or even 1 in 100 are typical risks for those persons who experience maximum exposure to various categories of industrial emissions. For one pollutant, butadiene, the risks at some sites are by EPA's projections 3 in 10; that is there will be 3 excess cancers for every 10 people maximally exposed at these sites. That's simply not an acceptable price whatever the benefits of this particular chemical.

Risks can also be elevated as the result of the urban soup of pollutants that some Americans are forced to breathe. A recent report by a California air pollution control agency indicates that the excess cancer risk from benzene pollution in Los Angeles County—this is just one pollutant, benzene—is 1 in 1,000. In the whole basin air toxics are projected to cause 222 additional cancer cases per year. So it's not just the national cancer incidence that is of concern. It is also the high risks faced by those individuals who experience extraordinary exposures in some communities.

And, of course, it is not only cancer. Many of the air toxics, especially the metals, can lead to other adverse health effects. And in recent months we have become aware of the environmental effects of these pollutants. The most dramatic evidence of damage is coming out of my region of the country, the Great Lakes. It is estimated that 80 percent of the toxics loading to Lake Superior is air deposition and that even for Lake Michigan—whose problems we normally associate with industrial discharges to rivers and tributaries—50 percent of the toxics are from air deposition. There is an isolated lake called Siskiwit on an island in Lake Superior that shows significant contamination from PCB's and toxaphene which could only have come as the result of air pollutant.

That's the continuous and routine emission side of the air toxics problem. These emissions occur every day—day after day. But we have also been awakened to the problem of sudden, catastrophic releases as the result of the tragedy in Bhopal and a series of chemical accidents here in the United States.

Again, I'll start with some EPA statistics. The agency keeps something called the acute hazards events data base which recorded 6,928 chemical accidents between 1980 and 1985. These accidents killed 138, injured another 4,717 and forced the evacuation of 217,000. EPA thinks the data captures about half the problem. These accidents resulted in the release of 420 million pounds of air toxics.

So here's a summary of the problem. A background cancer risk of 1 in 100,000 from the few dozen air toxics EPA has studied, dramatically higher risks for some portion of the population, noncancer effects, growing evidence of environmental damage, and an increasing number of catastrophic events which cause immediate death and injury and release large quantities of toxic pollutants.

Now the second part of the picture. What's EPA been doing about all of this? I want to say upfront that EPA is poorly equipped to address the problem of hazardous air pollutants. The law they have to work with, principally section 112 of the Clean Air Act, is not adequate to do the job. In a very few words it creates a fundamental dilemma which all of our very best thinkers, including Robert Bork on two different occasions, have been unable to successfully resolve. Section 112 requires EPA to protect public health from air toxics with an ample margin of safety. However, air toxics are mostly carcinogens and for carcinogens there is no safe level of exposure. It is generally impossible to completely prevent emissions and thus, to the extent we wish to continue enjoying the benefits of many chemicals, the mandate of section 112 cannot be fulfilled.

Whoever is to blame, there can be no doubt that the record is dismal. In 18 years, EPA has listed 8 pollutants. During that same period of time, the handful of States which have air toxics programs have been able to write standards of one type or another for 700 and 8 different pollutants. They are not all rigorous standards but it suggests the size of the chasm which yawns between the problem and the solution here at the Federal level.

On the question of routine and continuous emissions of air toxics, some of us have proposed legislation which would shift the focus from the health-based standard of the current section 112 to a technology-based standard as is used in other parts of the Clean Air Act and in the Clean Water Act. Major sources—that is big chemical plants, oil refineries and similar sources—of toxic air pollutants would have to install the best available control technology to prevent pollution.

To deal with the problem of accidental releases, we are proposing to borrow an institution which has worked well in the transportation field, that is the National Transportation Safety Board which investigates each airline or public transportation accident which results in a death. Legislation which we considered last year included a chemical safety board which would investigate chemical accidents and make recommendations to EPA on steps which could be taken to reduce the risk of catastrophic accidents.

KITTY GAMBLE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today is an important day in the life of my organization and the people of Minnesota. It marks the end of a distinguished career of one of the Senate's most devoted workers, Mrs. Kitty Gamble, my Minnesota chief of staff.

It was 30 years ago this month that my association with Kitty began. Her father, Fallon Kelly, was asked by President Eisenhower to be the U.S. attorney for Minnesota.

That left an empty chair in the South St. Paul law firm of LeVander, Gillen, and Miller. As a new graduate of law school, I filled that seat.

When Harold LeVander was elected Governor of Minnesota 7 years later he brought me along as executive director, and I received my exposure to public service from the inside.

Kitty's father gave me my "break," and she helped me make the most of it. In my first two campaigns for the Senate in 1978 and 1982, Kitty Gamble was a key player in the operation.

They say that an army marches on its stomach. Well my experience tells me that a campaign moves on the backs of its volunteers. That was Kitty's job, building a work force of people who wanted to make a difference by getting involved in political campaigns.

She did an outstanding job, and consequently I am here to tell about it. In 1983, Kitty became my Minnesota staff director after the sudden death of George Theiss. She has served with incredible energy, constancy and skill every single day since that time.

Kitty came to my office from a career in public health nursing. She has had almost a second career in volunteer work and has made an outstanding contribution to the United Way of Minnesota.

She and her husband, Bill Gamble, have also raised an outstanding family of four children, Kathy, Molly, Jimmy, and Scott.

Mr. President, as Senators, we have the opportunity to work with a lot of people, at various levels. They ease our burdens, advance our agendas and provide help to people where we can't. It is a unique person about whom you can say "They always give their best."

Mr. President, Kitty Gamble always gave me, the Senate, and the people of Minnesota her very best. It has been an honor to be associated with her and an inspiration to work alongside a person who holds the banner of personal and public service so high.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I welcome the opportunity to join my colleagues in urging that the Senate act on the Clean Air Act.

I also commend my colleagues on the Environment Committee, including the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. DURENBERGER, with whom I have worked very closely on a section called air toxics.

I also want to compliment the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Montana, Mr. BAUCUS, for moving on this very important legislation.

President Bush has said that there is a new breeze blowing in the country. Mr. President, the American people want to know that this breeze contains air which is safe to breathe, which does not harm trees, lakes and coastal waters and which doesn't pose a threat of a Bhopal type accident in the United States.

The Clean Air Act authorization expired in 1981 and the Congress has not reauthorized, and more importantly strengthened the act. This is primarily the fault of the Reagan administration which first tried to weaken the act and when that failed, opposed every effort to strengthen the act.

To his credit, President Bush has promised to present the Congress with clear air legislation. This is a major advance over the Reagan administration position, and one that makes me optimistic that we will be able to enact clean air legislation. If the President delivers a reasonable bill, he will find a Congress willing to work closely with him.

Mr. President, the time to pass a strong clean air bill is long overdue. Over 100 million people live in areas that exceed the existing ozone standard and almost 30 million live in areas that fail to meet the carbon monoxide standard. This, even though the standards were supposed to be achieved by 1977. Violations of the ozone health standard can result in lung function impairment and adverse effects on crops, forests, and materials. Carbon monoxide violations can result in reduced work capacity and fetal effects.

In 1988 in New Jersey, the ozone standard was violated 45 days, the highest number of violations in 5 years, with levels over 66 percent higher than the ozone standard. And this despite having some of the toughest air pollution controls in the Nation. We need to enact legislation with tougher requirements and which require pollution control in States contributing to standard violations in other States like New Jersey.

We also need to reduce emissions of pollutants which cause acid deposition. Acid rain has adverse effects on visibility, materials, pollution of lakes and streams and coastal areas, trees and crops.

Rain in New Jersey has been measured at levels at least 70 to 80 times more acidic than natural rain. New Jersey streams and lakes are vulnerable to continued acid deposition.

In addition, acid rain has been linked to elevated levels of nitrogen in coastal waters resulting in a loss of oxygen in the water and long-term decline of marine life. EPA is doing little to address this problem. I added language to the fiscal year 1989 HUD independent agency appropriation report requiring EPA to develop a plan by June 1, 1989, to research and monitor the role of atmospheric deposition in coastal waters.

Finally, we need to address toxic air pollutants. Toxic air pollutants presents one of the most serious threats to human health. An EPA study of just 20 toxic air pollutants concluded that these pollutants resulted in 1,700 to 2,000 cancer cases a year. EPA's own 1987 comparative analysis of risks concluded that toxic air pollutants posed a high risk of cancer and noncancer health risks when compared to other sources of pollution. Air toxics also are increasingly believed to be a cause of environmental contamination including coastal pollution.

Yet, since the Clean Air Act was first enacted in 1970, EPA has regulated just seven pollutants. It is clear that the existing regulatory system is inadequate. And as air toxics emissions data becomes available under the right-to-know legislation, the public is going to demand action to reduce this pollution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be given such time to complete this statement and another one that follows, not to exceed 7 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, did the Senator mean 7 additional minutes?

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Seven additional minutes.

In response to the Senator from New Mexico, I did ask the majority leader if he was compelled to cut off at 4 o'clock. He assured me that any statements that must be made, we will have the time to do so, and that 4 o'clock, as I understood him—the Senator would have to get that from him directly—is flexible.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am not worried about 4 o'clock. I want to know more or less when I might be doing mine.

I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may continue.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, we need to be concerned about catastrophic accidents involving toxic pollutants, not just routine emissions. EPA says that there have been over 11,000 accidents in the 1980's resulting in roughly 11,000 injuries and 309 deaths.

The right-to-know legislation, which I authored, partially addresses this problem by requiring industry to make information available to communities which can then plan for emergencies. But the record of accidents in the United States makes it clear that more needs to be done to protect the public from accidents like which occured in Bhopal.

Mr. President, we need to act now. I plan to do my share to see that clean air legislation is passed expeditiously.

THE NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I would like to take the remainder of my time to address another subject, one which we heard about substantially from the Republican leader when he admonished us not to look at the files available in S. 407 from the FBI and remind us that the majority report that we saw up there alongside the FBI report was in fact only a majority report and did not reflect the views of the minority nor was it a complete committee report.

The staff up there was very explicit. They said this is a report from the majority membership on the Armed Services Committee and in no way suggested or intimated that it might reflect the opinions of all. So we were appropriately cautioned as we looked at those documents.

Mr. President, I plan to vote against the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. The FBI report, which I read yesterday, confirmed my initial misgivings about his nomination. After reviewing the body of evidence, including the hearings of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I cannot vote to confirm.

In my mind, there is no doubt that Senator Tower has the knowledge of defense and the intellectual capacity to fill this post. Those qualifications are not at issue here. However, the concerns about Tower's past behavior—from a serious drinking problem to conflict of interest stemming from his past relationships with defense contractors, have raised sufficient doubts in my mind about Senator Tower's fitness to serve that I cannot vote for his nomination.

Some may argue that any doubts about Tower's nomination must be resolved in favor of confirming the President's choice. I disagree. Any doubts must be resolved in favor of our national security. They must be resolved in favor of the best interests of the American people and of our Nation. Under article II of the Constitution, the Senate has a responsibility independent of the President's to judge the fitness of Cabinet nominees. Because of that responsibility, the Senate is held in some measure responsible for the performance of a nominee to whom they have given consent. We cannot be a rubberstamp for the President's choice.

In matters of national security, the Senate's responsibility to scrutinize the President's choice is especially heavy. The Secretary of Defense holds the fate of our fighting men and women, our Nation, and possibly the globe in his or her hands. He is directly under the President in the chain of command. He will be called upon to advise the President in times of national crisis—when our men have been attacked, our planes shot down, when American hostages are taken. He must make decisions at all times of the day or night, often with little time and even less information.

The Secretary must have a clear head to carry out these responsibilities. He holds the security of our Nation in his hands. Those hands must be steady at the helm. I do not believe that John Tower meets those standards. The issue of his past alcohol use weighs more heavily on my mind than his future promises of sobriety, as sincere as they may be. We cannot afford to base our Nation's security on the hope that someone with a history of problems with alcohol will be able to resist that temptation in the future.

Further, the next Secretary of Defense faces the daunting task of cleaning up our defense procurement system and restoring the faith of the American people in our Defense Department. He must make tough decisions about how to do more for our national defense while spending less. Those decisions may at times run counter to the best interests of some defense contractors, who depend on a particular weapon system for the bulk of their business.

The Secretary of Defense must be able to exercise sound judgment on these issues and resist pressures based on past loyalties or future opportunities. John Tower's extensive past associations with defense contractors raise the question of whether he possesses the objectivity to carry out these tasks. In addition, his acceptance of lucrative consulting work from defense contractors immediately after resigning from the U.S. arms control delegations in Geneva also raises concerns about his judgment and his sensitivity to the appearance of impropriety.

In view of the high standard to which we must hold the Secretary of Defense, and my continued misgivings about Senator Tower's ability to meet that standard, I will vote no on his nomination.

PROGRESS ON S. 335, MEDICARE CATASTROPHIC COVERAGE REVISION ACT OF 1989

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, on February 2, I introduced legislation—S. 335—to delay implementation of some of the provisions in the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act in order to permit Congress ample time to revisit the act to determine what, if any, changes ought to be made to the act.

I have come to the floor this afternoon to briefly discuss my rationale for offering S. 335, and to discuss the recent backing of this legislation by the "Coalition for Affordable Health Care."

As I stated when I introduced S. 335, the adoption of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988 has raised a firestorm among our Nation's senior citizens.

ACT DOES NOT PROTECT FROM GREATEST NEED

That act began as a proposal to provide Medicare beneficiaries with coverage of long-term hospitalizations. It was greatly expanded to include coverage of everything from mammography screening to out-patient prescription drug coverage. With this expansion of benefits, came a dramatic increase in the cost of the package for our Nation's seniors.

While the original package only required a nominal increase in the monthly Medicare part B premium, and was optional, the final package included a flat increase in the monthly Medicare part B premium in addition to a requirement that all seniors—with over $150 in Federal tax liability—pay a surtax, regardless of whether they need or want the coverage.

Yet, Mr. President, after all was said and done, the act failed to provide protection from the greatest catastrophic health concern of our Nation's seniors—the financial ravages of an illness requiring long-term care.

As I have spoken with seniors about the act, and read the letters they are sending me—still numbering several hundred per week, I have found many seniors to be shocked or angered at discovering that the act does not even begin to address long-term care.

WHAT CONTRIBUTED TO FIRESTORM AMONG SENIORS

In my opinion, several things have contributed to the firestorm that has erupted among our Nation's seniors.

First, given the great need for protection from the financial ravages of long-term care services, the title of the act—the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1989—is somewhat misleading. For many seniors, the title evoked certain images in seniors' minds about what would be covered. Seniors thought of health services needed for such illnesses, or maladies, as Alzheimer's disease, a stroke, or the breaking of a hip. Yet, Mr. President, all of these require long-term care services in one form or another. And, seniors found that, for the most part, they will not receive such coverage through this act.

It is with good reason that the greatest fear of older Americans in the health care area is the expense of long-term care services.

By the time you hit 65, you stand a 50 percent chance of entering a nursing home during the remaining period of your life. And, with the cost of a year's stay in a nursing home ranging from $22,000–$35,000, all but the most affluent elderly can be bankrupted. It is alarming that close to 90 percent of single older Americans become impoverished within a year after they enter a nursing home, as a result of the financial burden of the cost of care.

While many of the benefits in the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act are available—in one form or another—in the private sector, at a fairly reasonable cost, the same is not true for long-term care. There are a number of policies available in the private market that cover nursing home services, but the price of real protection is very high. According to a May 1988 Consumer Reports analysis, the cost to a 65-year-old for an average plan offering real protection is $1,200 a year and up, and $3,500 and up if purchased at age 35. A study by the Brookings Institution, last year, echoed these findings.

While I may differ with Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER as to what form public sector coverage of long-term care services should take, he was right when he said—"protection from long-term care costs is the most important catastrophic illness protection need in the eyes of our Nation's seniors."

The second thing that has contributed to the firestorm is that the act mandates that all seniors—with tax liability in excess of $150—contribute to financing the benefit, regardless of whether they need or want the coverage.

And, third, the expense of the act for our Nation's seniors is going to make it exceedingly difficult for Congress to provide any meaningful public sector coverage of long-term care services, without putting the bulk of the cost on the shoulders of the nonelderly. Seniors realize this, and it concerns them greatly.

POSITION ON FINANCING

At this point, I would like to take a moment to explain my position regarding the financing of catastrophic illness protection benefits for the elderly.

In my opinion, the cost of any new catastrophic illness benefits ought to be borne by the senior population. The Federal budget deficit situation, and the relative wealth of the senior population—as compared with other age-groups—dictates that this be the case. That was the premise of the act we passed last year, and it is a sound premise.

I think not only do the majority of my colleagues agree with this position, but the senior population do as well. It appears, however, that two things must be true in order for a package to receive the support of seniors.

First, the benefits offered must address their true catastrophic needs.

And, second, the financing must be equitable, and must have some provision for those who are least well off financially.

To varying degrees, I think seniors view the act as having failed in both regards.

LETTERS FROM SENIORS

I would like to read from a couple of the 50 or so letters I received one day last week—letters which are representative of the mail I have been receiving to date regarding the act.

A gentleman from Sun City wrote me:

Senior Citizens' Catastrophic Health Protection—a catastrophe in itself.

First, this "solution" doesn't touch the big bugaboo that concerns our aging senior citizens—custodial care for those who just cannot handle the problems of living alone and have no one to turn to for such care without going in to personal bankruptcy.

Lastly, we are advised in the income tax seminars that this premium, assessed as a "surtax" on the income tax, will not be deductible from tax, will not be deductible from tax returns as an insurance premium.

A woman from Cottonwood, AZ, wrote me:

It looks to me that what passed as "catastrophic coverage" has become a catastrophe for the elderly. What we really need is coverage for long term nursing home care. What we got was a prescription drug program that over 80 percent of us cannot qualify for, and a catastrophic cap that 93 percent of us will not qualify for either.

Now we have to pay a surtax of 15 percent that goes up to 25 percent in 1990.

We urge you and your colleagues to take another look at the surtax method of financing as well as at the entire program which does not meet our real needs of long-term care.

A man from Mesa, AZ wrote:

I do volunteer work 4 days a week for the AARP doing tax counseling for the elderly and low-income people. I have yet to find any seniors in favor of the Catastrophic Coverage Act. I live in an adult trailer park of all retired seniors on Social Security. At a recent park meeting, not one person said they were in favor of the Act. The same is true with all others we have talked to, including people we prepare income taxes for.

Although most of us answered "yes" on questionaires about the bill, they did not expect to get this. It does not even cover custodial or intermediate care.

A woman from Tucson, AZ wrote me:

The new catastrophic health care program is a disaster. Instead of easing the health care burden on the elderly, it increases their burden.

For example, the Medicare gap insurance premiums have been increased; whereas, the elderly were told that since Medicare coverage has been increased the gap insurance premiums would be lowered. What has happened? Most of us still need gap coverage, and we got increases in both Medicare premiums and gap insurance premiums.

A man from Florence, AZ, wrote me:

I am not opposed to Medicare benefits simply because they cost me money. For example, although I would not need to participate, I would be willing to see my Medicare dollars go toward long-term custodial or nursing home care (which, of course, is not covered under the "Catastrophic Coverage Act").

Of the 9,000 or so letters I have received since the enactment of the law, less than 10 have been in favor of the act.

A recent meeting of a local chapter of the AARP in my home State of Arizona provides another vivid example of how seniors feel about the act. Following the showing of a film that's been produced to defend the "Catastrophic Coverage Act," the president of the chapter called on its 200 or so members present to raise their hands if they supported the act. Only two hands were raised.

PETER IS WILLING TO PAY FOR PETER'S BENEFITS

With regard to the concern that seniors are expressing about the act—particularly, the financing—I have heard some of my colleagues say:

What we have is a bunch of wealthy seniors who are upset because we are finally making Peter pay for Peter's benefits, and they don't like it.

Well, from what I have been hearing from seniors, Peter is willing to pay for Peter's benefits. That is, provided that they are the benefits Peter feels he really needs.

It is in an effort to permit us the time to remedy this situation, and to determine whether indeed some changes ought to be made to the act, that I offered S. 335, the "Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Revision Act of 1989."

MY HISTORY WITH ISSUE

I do not come to this issue as one who is opposed to providing seniors with some protection from the financial ravages of a catastrophic illness through the public sector.

In fact, in February 1987 I joined Senator DOLE and others in introducing the original catastrophic illness protection legislation. This legislation would have added—for a nominal additional flat premium for Medicare beneficiaries—a long-term hospitalization benefit to the pool of benefits available through the Medicare Program. While some argued this legislation was not comprehensive enough, I felt it was a good start at addressing the catastrophic health care protection needs of our Nation's seniors.

In October 1987, I voted in favor of a more comprehensive piece of legislation aimed at providing seniors with protection from the financial ravages of a catastrophic illness. While it added a drug benefit, and several other benefits, like the original legislation, it did not provide protection from that which seniors feel is their greatest health care protection need—protection from the financial ravages of long-term care. However, because this legislation did not require beneficiaries to pay for the coverage if they chose not to participate in the program, and because of my perception that the proposal enjoyed the support of the vast majority of out Nation's seniors, I voted for it.

But, as this issue was further addressed in the House, I began to sense some growing concern among seniors over the direction that Congress seemed to be moving in this area.

INPUT FROM ARIZONA SENIORS

I decided the only way to get a good handle on what was going on with respect to the views of seniors, was to take this issue directly to the seniors. So, I sent the majority of seniors in Arizona a comprehensive mailing outlining the major provisions of the Senate bill, including the bill's costs. Mr. President, I heard back from over 30,000 senior Arizonans in response to the mailing.

The response was very telling.

Less than 1 out of every 3 of the respondents supported the legislation.

It was the input from seniors in my State who were telling me on a margin of 4-to-1 that the Senate version was not the answer, and major changes in the legislation—such as participation in the financing of the program becoming mandatory, regardless of whether the individual wanted to participate in the program, and that the premiums were not going to be deductible on Federal tax returns as health care costs—that led me to ultimately decide to vote against the final version of the bill. A vote that was very difficult to cast.

PROVISIONS OF S. 335

Mr. President, the legislation I offered on February 2, S. 335, will allow the long-term hospitalization, which has already been implemented to stay on-line.

Second, it will permit the spousal impoverishment protection to come on-line—as currently scheduled—beginning in July 1989. Senator MIKULSKI really deserves the credit for this provision being included in the act, as she has been tirelessly promoting the need to provide seniors with spousal impoverishment protection. In my opinion, the spousal impoverishment protection is likely the most important provision in the act in terms of addressing a true catastrophic illness protection need.

Third, it will delay implementation of the other benefits in the act for a year.

Fourth, it will delay implementation of the supplemental premiums for a year. This would afford Congress the opportunity to review, through public hearings, whether we indeed have taken the wrong road.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the flat increase in the Medicare premiums attributable to the act—which was levied on the seniors earlier this year—is sufficient to pay for the benefits that have already been put into place plus the spousal impoverishment benefit. If, as a result of the hearings, it was determined that we should drop the benefits for which implementation had been delayed and do something in the area of long-term care, the flat premium—which is slated to increase to $7.18 by 1993—would not only support the cost of these benefits, it would result in a surplus of $1.16 billion over the next 5 years.

I believe the senior population of this country is willing to pay for a benefit package that provides them with protection from the financial ravages of a catastrophic illness. And, given the high deficits, I believe the only way we can provide additional benefits in this area is if the elderly population at large supports the bulk of the cost. I recognize the concern over the surtax concept. Perhaps, in revisiting the act, we might be able to find a way to achieve the goal of spreading the burden generously across the senior population, without having them actually paying on their tax forms—especially when it is nondeductible. The nondeductibility issue perhaps ought to be looked at as well.

COALITION FOR AFFORDABLE HEALTH CARE BACKS S. 335

It is the contention that the act does not provide seniors with protection from their greatest catastrophic illness fears, and that Congress ought to revisit the act, that led the Coalition for Affordable Health Care, on February 22, to back S. 335.

The coalition is composed of some 31 organizations—some are national groups—such as the National Association of Retired Federal Employees and the Retired Officers Association—and some are State-based seniors groups. They have come together over the common view they share that the "Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act" does not represent the greatest catastrophic illness protection needs of the Nation's seniors, and that Congress ought to delay implementation of the benefits not already on-line to give Congress the opportunity to revisit that act through public hearings. What struck me most about the coalition is that it represents all ends of the political spectrum.

Here we have a perfect example of strange bedfellows joining together over a common concern. It is not often that you see such a wide diversity of groups working arm-in-arm on an issue. That they would do this ought to be an indication of the widespread level of concern regarding the act.

Mr. President, I would like to have printed for the RECORD a list of the groups in the Coalition for Affordable Health Care.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. McCAIN. I would like to take a moment to read from the statement that the coalition drafted at the time that they backed S. 335.

The "Coalition for Affordable Health Care" evolved in response to concern voiced by senior citizens that the Medicare Catastrophic law imposes a mandatory surtax while failing to provide coverage for the real health catastrophe they fear—long-term illnesses.

The Coalition believes that the law's spousal impoverishment provision is praiseworthy and the extended hospital coverage valuable. However, we urge Congress to delay implementation of the controversial surtax and further benefits until Congress can reassess the new law.

At its meeting on February 22, the CAHC agreed to focus immediate attention on building bipartisan support for S. 335, legislation introduced by Senator JOHN MCCAIN. The McCain approach does not seek to dismantle the new law, but rather to step back and evaluate whether or not the law truly meets the needs of our nation's seniors. The legislation will afford Congress the opportunity to reevaluate—through public hearings—whether or not Congress missed the mark in designing the present package.

WE MUST REVISIT THE ACT

Mr. President, I strongly believe we have a responsibility to provide the seniors with a package that meets their true needs, particularly since they are paying the bill. And, given that we appear to have not done so, we must revisit the act.

In doing so, it is important that we put implementation of some of the benefits on hold to permit us the opportunity to make any needed changes that may become apparent as a result of the hearings.

I urge my colleagues to look at what their constituents are saying to them about the Catastrophic Illness Coverage Act. I know many of them, as have I, have been hearing from a great many seniors regarding their discontent with where we went with the catastrophic illness legislation. In addition, I would encourage them to look at what the Coalition for Affordable Health Care is saying, and to determine whether the approach this legislation takes would meet the concerns of their State's senior population. Senators WILSON, COCHRAN, GORTON, BOREN and HEFLIN have all done so, and joined on as cosponsors. It is not insignificant that Senators WILSON, COCHRAN, BOREN, and HEFLIN all voted for the bill.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN S. 335 AND OTHER BILLS

Before closing, I would just like to briefly address the difference between S. 335 and a couple of different approaches that are also out there.

First, a number of proposals would repeal the entire act. I do not believe, as do some, that we should pull down the whole act—as there are certainly some provisions which are truly catastrophic-related. What is more, we may indeed find that—by and large—the seniors of this country would prefer to have all of the provisions in the act rather than see us do something in the way of long-term care.

Second, a couple of proposals that would delay what has not already been implemented and establish a Commission to study whether we should change those portions of the act not already implemented. While I do think we should delay these provisions, in my opinion the spousal impoverishment benefit ranks high on the list of catastrophic illness-related benefits that the seniors want—much to Senator MIKULSKI's credit. In addition, Congress should be in charge of reviewing the act and not duck behind a Commission. I think we owe it to the seniors of this country to take responsibility for what we have done. I do not believe that seniors will hold it against us if we correct our course—given that we were embarking in uncharted waters.

CONCLUSION

I welcome the participation of the "Coalition for Affordable Health Care" in this effort to correct the course, and provide this Nation's seniors with true protection from the financial ravages of those catastrophic illness-related services that are of the greatest concern. And, I would welcome any more of my colleagues that would like to join myself, and Senators WILSON, COCHRAN, GORTON, BOREN, and HEFLIN, in this effort.

JAPANESE ASSISTANCE TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BURMA

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to express my gravest concern about the decision of the Government of Japan on February 16 to extend formal recognition to the military government of Burma, as well as my hope that Japan will not abandon its commitment to human rights in that country. I trust that Japan will not follow its offer of recognition with an offer of financial assistance, nor of increased economic ties. Japan, and, indeed, the other nations of Asia and of the world should continue to withhold assistance from Burma until the Rangoon regime demonstrates a commitment to free elections and national reconciliation. The announcement of elections in May 1990 is an encouraging move, but much clearer commitments are necessary—a cease-fire in the civil war so that all Burmese may participate, freedom for political organization by opposition parties, a precise election timetable, and a mechanism for international observation. A premature offer of aid by Japan will serve as a reward to the Burmese military for failing to live up to its commitments, and for brutally suppressing prodemocratic dissent.

Burma has been in turmoil for nearly a year. A democratic uprising drove out one government in the spring, and then another. When the military took formal control of the government in September, Japan earned the world's admiration for withholding assistance from the new government and demanding democracy. Burma had clearly become ungovernable. A civil war has left much of its outlying provinces in the hands of ethnic groups fighting for federalism and democracy, and thousands of civilians, many of them university students, have fled to border camps. As many as 3,000 of their compatriots never made it, for they were shot by the military.

I am certain the Japanese Government will recognize that there can be no profit in investing in Burma. Most of its unexploited natural resources—gems, teak, oil, and minerals—lie in parts of the country where civil war makes development impossible. Burma's universities are closed and their students are dying of malaria in border camps, rather than training to become engineers, doctors, and technicians. Burmese currency is worthless, and has been partially supplanted by jade, precious stones, and opium in black market border trading.

I understand that some elements of the Japanese Government continue to resist moves to strengthen ties with the Burmese military. Their position is commendable and I expect their voices will be heard. No aid should be provided, nor should Burma's debt be renegotiated or interest payments suspended or forgiven, until democracy is restored. Similarly, the Mitsubishi group should not continue with the construction of the airport in Rangoon.

Japan's policy was until days ago a guiding example of the proper approach to the Burmese crisis. Despite this regrettable move, I hope that Japan's expectations of the Burmese military regime will be more clearly defined.

This is a most crucial moment in the crisis, and a most inopportune moment for a country as important as Japan to make such an overture, for at this very moment the United Nations Human Rights Commission is considering the human rights violations of the Burmese regime. The American delegation will make every effort to highlight the Burmese tragedy. I trust the Japanese delegation will join us, for silence on the part of an Asian democracy would be interpreted as tacit approval of the Burmese regime.

Let us, Japan and the United States, and all other democratic nations, withhold assistance until firm and verifiable steps are taken to end the killings in Burma, to restore democracy and to hold free and fair elections. The valiant protesters of Burma are looking toward us. We must not and cannot let them down.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter several of my colleagues and I sent to the State Department regarding human rights in Burma, and a copy of the State Department's response, be printed in the RECORD at this time. I also ask unanimous consent that two recent articles about human rights in Burma from the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 26, 1989.

Hon. ARMANDO VALLADERES,
Chairman, United States Delegation to the United Nations Human Rights Commission, Department of State, Washington, DC.

DEAR AMBASSADOR VALLADERES: We trust that you will find occasion to bring up the repression of human rights in Burma when the U.N. Human Rights Commission convenes in Geneva on January 30th. Specifically, we urge that you make every effort to ensure that a resolution concerning Burma be considered by the Commission at this year's meeting. As you know, on August 11 of last year the Senate unanimously passed a resolution (S. Res. 464) that condemned the military government of Burma and that called upon the Secretary of State and the Permanent Representative to the United Nations to encourage the restoration of democracy in Burma and to condemn the killings and mass arrests committed there.

Last summer, after 26 years of authoritarian rule and economic stagnation, the people of Burma took to the streets in protest. Their demands were elemental and just. They sought free elections. Free speech. An accounting of the victims of police violence. For a brief moment it seemed they would carry the day. But then the army cracked down. The military took formal control of the state apparatus on September 18, and made clear it would never share power, nor permit opposition. Soldiers fired into crowds with machine guns, mortars, and recoiless rifles. Thousands of unarmed demonstrators were killed. Over 6,000 civilians, fearing for their lives, have fled to the Burmese-Thai border.

What is more, the extraordinary display of brutality in Rangoon and in other cities last summer has for many years been a commonplace feature of the Burmese army's treatment of ethnic minority peoples living within Burma's borders. In an August, 1988 report, Amnesty International found evidence of "a consistent pattern of unlawful killing and ill-treatment of members of Burma's ethnic minorities by security forces." Countless villagers belonging to the Shan, Kachin, Karen, Palaung, Wa and the many other minority groups of Burma have been beaten, tortured, or killed for their suspected allegiance to government opponents. The army has forcibly conscripted many of them to carry heavy loads down jungle trails, and to sweep minefields. Young Burmans in Rangoon are now being similarly conscripted, destined to die anonymously in the mud of a rain forest.

All this has happened to a people that have demonstrated a remarkable faith in America and in our capacity for moral behavior. After the passage of S. Res. 464, our embassy in Rangoon became the focal point of pro-democracy demonstrations, such that our ambassador, Burton Levin, termed it the "Hyde Park of Rangoon" in a talk at the Asia Society in New York on November 29.

In his talk, Ambassador Levin concluded that by promoting human rights in Burma "we have in a sense the luxury of living up to our principles." We agree. Bringing up the case of Burma at the Human Rights Commission would ensure that the Burmese military cannot continue to behave as it has without feeling the world's condemnation. So massive a violation of the human rights of a people who have such faith in American democracy should not be forgotten.

In addition, we ask that you encourage the member nations of the Association of South East Asian Nations and other appropriate nations in the region, such as India, South Korea, and Japan, to maintain support for democratic liberalization and human rights in Burma. Thailand, especially, as Burma's most involved neighbor, has a critical role to play in the effort of the Burmese people to win the same freedoms that the Thai people already enjoy.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Claiborne Pell, Alan Cranston, Carl Levin, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Paul Simon, Richard G. Lugar, Rudy Boschwitz, Edward M. Kennedy.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: Thank you for your letter of January 25, 1989, concerning the violations of human rights in Burma.

We fully agree with your assessment of the human rights situation in Burma. As you have noted, our Embassy has taken the lead in protesting the serious human rights violations which have occurred there in recent months.

Please be assured that we are working to bring the issues of Burma before the United Nations Human Rights Commission currently meeting in Geneva. We have also communicated with other UNHCR member states on this subject. These efforts are on-going and will continue.

Thank you for communicating with us on this important subject.

Sincerely,

BETSY R. WARREN,
Acting Assistant Secretary,
Legislative Affairs.

BURMA BECOMES A TEST CASE IN HUMAN-RIGHTS POLITICS

(By Steven Erlanger)

RANGOON, BURMA.—Burma's new military leaders paid dearly for their brutal crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrations in September. Not only were they shunned diplomatically, but nearly all the country's foreign aid—including $300 million from the Japanese, $100 million from the West Germans and $12 million from the United States—was suspended. The effect was to cut off 90 percent of Burma's foreign exchange.

In one sense, Burma's ostracism was a clear victory for the cause of human rights, but it was only a temporary one. The dictates of self-interest for several Asian countries have clouded the issue, lending Burma's rulers comfort and tending to delay, some diplomats say, the setting of a date for multi-party elections.

The Burmese experience has been instructive. It shows a growing willingness by Japan to take the lead in foreign policy in Southeast Asia, as the United States keeps urging it to do. The Japanese were quick to suspend aid, though they now find themselves under increasing pressure from businessmen to resume it.

But the response of several other Asian countries, notably Thailand and South Korea, has disappointed some Western diplomats. In the case of South Korea, they find it regrettable that a country that has itself recently cast off an autocratic regime has been quick to cozy up to a particularly nasty version in Rangoon.

The Thais, seeking trade, have organized the repatriation of Burmese student protesters. The South Koreans have made commercial deals that offer Burma some needed foreign exchange. And other Southeast Asian countries, including the Philippines, increasingly behave as if the September events never occurred.

The effect of any diplomatic action on a country that has been as poor, isolated and strategically unimportant as Burma has for the last 26 years is debatable in any case. And no aid suspension is likely to be airtight for long. Still, the eagerness of neighboring nations to make their peace with the Burmese has unquestionably softened the impact of the Japanese and Western initiative.

As far as the United States is concerned, a senior Western diplomat said, "Burma is a place where, with so few interests, Americans have the luxury of living up to their principles." No geopolitical struggle is under way for Burma, he noted. There are no American military bases or oil companies; there is no autocratic but ancient American ally like the late Shah of Iran or Ferdinand E. Marcos, to spin down the memory hole with pained expressions of regret.

The United States, said American officials here and in Bangkok, has three basic interests here: limiting narcotics production, developing trade and investment, and promoting adherence to human rights. And it hasn't made much progress.

In the early 1980's, the Americans gave economic assistance, fellowships and scholarships. "We fawned and supplicated, but to what end?" an American official said. "We got nothing, just bureaucracy and negativism." To attack narcotics, a diplomat said, the Americans had provided about $5 million a year, a little intelligence and some helicopters and transport planes. At best the effort only reduced the rate of increase of raw opium production.

KEEPING UP PRESSURE

The human-rights issue is self-evident, say these officials, who try to monitor, as best they can, continuing abuses like the arrest and disappearance of student demonstrators. This is no time, the officials say, to try accommodation again and reduce what limited pressure can be applied.

Asian interests, on the other hand, are more direct, because Burma represents a major potential market. The Thais share a long border with Burma, profit from a huge black-market trade and respect the tough Burmese military. They have snuggled up closest to General Saw Maung, the new Burmese leader.

The Thai Army Commander in Chief, Gen. Chavalit Yongchaiyudh, has arranged the repatriation of Burmese students—nearly 300 so far—who had fled to join ethnic insurgencies. The repatriations are said to be voluntary, but Amnesty International says some students were forced to return and face arrest.

South Korea has also tried to fill the gap left by Japan and the West. Burma has been selling off fishing rights, and the South Koreans have been eager to buy, and to discuss new investments, diplomats say.

And while Western ambassadors made a point of being out of Burma so they could decline invitations to Independence Day celebrations Jan. 4, all the representatives of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations were in attendance—including the Ambassador of the Philippines, whose President, Corazon C. Aquino, is the prime beneficiary of the sort of "people power" so ruthlessly crushed in Rangoon.

SOME BURMESE STUDENT PROTESTERS DISAPPEAR WHILE IN ARMY CUSTODY

(By Steven Erlanger)

RANGOON, BURMA.—Some student demonstrators have disappeared or died in custody since the Burmese Army suppressed demonstrations for democracy on Sept. 18, while the army has forced thousands of people to serve as porters and "human minesweepers" in battles against ethnic insurgents, diplomats and Burmese say.

Western and Asian diplomats caution that the number of demonstrators and students arrested and tortured or killed in custody since Sept. 18 is impossible to determine, despite a recent United States State Department statement saying the number of "credible reports" may be as high as 50.

A spokesman for the Burmese military Government said, "Rumors about arrests and deaths of students in Government custody are absolutely unfounded and malicious." But many Burmese believe them, and diplomats say they have confirmed at least four cases in and around Rangoon, with the likelihood of more in Mandalay and the countryside.

In one case, diplomats say, a woman said her neighbor's son returned to Rangoon in October from an insurgent camp near the Thai border. The mother urged him to register with the authorities so they would know he was back. He was reluctant, arguing that perhaps they did not know he had gone, but he finally did as his mother suggested.

Two days later he was arrested. Five days after that, his mother received a letter saying he had died in jail of malaria.

In two cases known to him, a diplomat said, the army came to Rangoon houses and arrested students who had returned from the Thai border. The parents have not heard from their two sons again, and the military says it has no knowledge or record of them.

In another, an arrested student was brought home by the army paralyzed from the waist down, and his parents say he is unable or unwilling to talk.

In mid-December, a professional called in for questioning in Rangoon was kept in prison overnight. He said that he was treated reasonably well, but that he was kept awake at night by screams.

The Burmese Army has traditionally run the countryside, especially in border areas where insurgencies are common, and impressment of young men for porterage is not unknown. But in October and November, a series of army sweeps in and around Rangoon picked up several thousand workers and students, diplomats and Burmese professionals say.

IMPRESSMENT FOR 500

In mid-October in North Okkalapa, a working-class suburb of Rangoon, the army told ward leaders that it wanted volunteers to rebuild the North Okkalapa Plastics Factory, looted during the summer protests. Nearly 500 workers showed up, and they were surrounded by soldiers and informed that they would be porters. A few protesters were beaten with rifle butts. The rest were told that those who tried to escape would be shot.

The men's hands were tied behind their backs and they were taken in trucks to a jail, where they spent the night, before going on to Karen state and the battle for a border outpost, Mae Tha Waw, that Karen guerrillas had recaptured Oct. 12.

The men walked for seven days with their loads of ammunition, weapons and mines, with little to eat and no way to carry food. They soaked their clothes in rivers and sucked them for liquid.

At the battle zone, they were put in front of troops and suffered a Karen ambush. Some discarded their loads, fled and were shot. The wounded were left untended.

During three days at the front with no food, the porters had to dig graves and walk through suspected minefields. Some lost limbs. Then a few escaped and made their way to a Karen village and then on to Rangoon, passing corpses or the wounded, many of them gangrenous and delerious, on the trail. The Burmese Army finally retook Mae Tha Waw on Dec. 21.

QUOTAS FOR PORTERS

In mid-November, again in North Okkalapa, the army announced a special show at a movie theater closed since August. After the show, diplomats said, soldiers surrounded the moviegoers and took them off to be porters. Some ward councils were given quotas for porters in November, Burmese say, believed to total about 3,000 for Rangoon and its suburbs.

In a similar case in November, another diplomat said, a young man was seized from a Rangoon street as a vagrant because he had no identification with him. Along with about 2,000 others, he was taken to Karen state to work as a porter. Conditions were poor, with little food, and some porters jumped into ravines to their deaths. He saw two men lose legs from mines. They were left by the side of the trail.

During the battle, porters were sent ahead of troops to gather water while the army covered them. He was required to make three roundtrips of three days' walk to carry wounded soldiers back to a village and more ammunition to the front.

Finally he, too, escaped. Suffering from malaria and dysentery, and made his way to Pegu, 50 miles north of Rangoon, where his family retrieved him.

"This story is typical of several," a diplomat said, "typical, at least, of those who survived."

POLITICAL ACTIVITY CURBED

In addition, open political discourse has been sharply curtailed, political party organizers have been arrested, criticism of the military and its leaders has been criminalized, gatherings of five or more people are banned and all newspapers except an official journal have been closed.

In the four known cases of those who have suffered in custody, diplomats stress that the students had fled Rangoon and then returned voluntarily, before a much-publicized Thai-Burmese effort beginning in late December to repatriate students on official flights. Though questioned, these students, who so far number 260, have been allowed to return home and have not been arrested, Burmese journalists and some Western diplomats believe.

[Amnesty International, in a report issued in Bangkok, said at lest one student flown back on Dec. 26, Thant Zin, had been arrested in his hometown of Mergui and has been held incommunicado since, his whereabouts unknown.]

Diplomats and Burmese say that with publicity and growing confidence on the part of the military, abuses of human rights are becoming slightly less common. They say the curtailment of civil and political rights depends on the commander in charge of any given military region, with Gen. Myint Aung, head of the Irrawaddy district east of Rangoon, considered especially harsh.

When Burmese have complained to him that some actions countervail the policies of the military leader, Gen. Saw Maung, Gen. Myint Aung has said, "Saw Maung rules in Rangoon, and I rule in Bassein."

One senior diplomat stressed the absolute and arbitrary nature of the army's power here, and said it was foolish to expect much delicacy about human rights from a military whose hold on power and privilege had come to seem so tenuous in September.

"One hundred years ago they were burying young boys in the corners of palaces for good luck," he said. "What they've done is terrible and we should say so, but the amount of leverage anyone has on them is pretty small."

SENATOR KASTEN'S LEADERSHIP ON CAPITAL GAINS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, Senator BOB KASTEN, has been a forceful advocate for reform of capital gains tax laws. I have cosponsored Senator KASTEN's bill, S. 171, to cut the capital gains tax rate because I share his view that this will mean more jobs, more small business formation, more economic growth, and a rising tide of prosperity and opportunity for all.

I invite the attention of the Senate to four articles by Senator KASTEN that recently appeared in the Washington Post, the Chicago Tribune, the Milwaukee Sentinel, and the Washington Times, together with an article by economics columnist Warren Brookes which highlights the Senator's leadership on the capital gains tax issue. I ask unanimous consent that these articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 7, 1989]

CAPITAL GAINS: THE RIGHT CUTS

(By Robert W. Kasten, Jr.)

In 1987, certain that I had discovered a sure-fire way to spark a new job-creation boom, I introduced a bill to cut the tax rate on capital gains from 28 to 15 percent. This proposal was adopted by then-vice president George Bush as a key economic element of his presidential campaign.

But the measure stalled on Capitol Hill. Some of my Democratic Senate colleagues, notably Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, and even a number of my Repubican friends raised what I thought were serious objections to my plan.

Sen. Bumpers, along with other leading Senate Democrats, supported reforming the capital gains tax to help spur productivity growth. But there were parts of the 15 percent bill that they thought were not the very best we could do to achieve that goal. And on some points at least, they were right. An across-the-board cut in the capital gains rate would, in fact, boost productivity growth and job creation. But it would also promote investment in real estate and collectibles, and encourage the kind of unproductive tax-sheltering activity that atrophied the economy back in the 1970s.

Boosting investment in coins, vintage cars and untenanted office buildings won't spark the kind of technological advances, industrial innovation and small-business formation we need to create 21st-century jobs for our workers.

I learned from last year's legislative debate on capital gains that the idea of lowering the capital gains rate is a sound one, but that it is essential to limit the new capital gains differential to job-creating, wealth-creating investment.

Because they recognize the immense economic value of a low capital gains rate, some of America's chief economic rivals (Germany, South Korea and many other countries) don't tax capital gains at all—and this has substantially increased their competitiveness.

We also have a serious capital shortage in this country. Since Black Monday, risky start-up ventures have found it difficult to sell initial public stock offerings. In a survey of start-up businesses by the national accounting firm Grant Thornton, 50 percent of the respondents said the crash forced them to abandon expansion plans—and only 10 percent eventually found venture-capital financing for their projects.

It would be tragic if we were to allow our disagreement on the specifics of capital gains legislation to sidetrack the competitive boost our workers and businesses need—the boost that Democrats and Republicans alike agree a cut in the capital gains tax rate would provide.

With this in mind, I have worked out a new capital gains proposal that takes into account the most serious objections to the Bush-Kasten proposal of 1987.

My bill contains three major new elements. First, it would reduce the capital gains tax by allowing taxpayers to exclude from their taxable income 50 percent of the capital gain on assets they have held for longer than one year.

But (the second element) it would limit this tax benefit entirely to corporate stocks, which make up only about 35 percent of the capital gains tax base. In this way, we would be able to liberate the capital of which so many small start-up businesses have been deprived. We would stem the leveraged buyout craze by reducing the cost of long-term equity capital and thus making debt financing less attractive. And we would revitalize our corporations by encouraging them to retain their earnings and reinvest them in increased productivity.

Third, the bill would index capital gains for any year in which inflation rises above 4 percent. While the 50 percent exclusion would lower the tax burden on holders of stock, this indexing provision would ease the burden on holders of non-equity assets, whose capital gains are mostly due to inflation.

It is inherently unfair to tax investors on a purely inflationary gain. Holders of assets such as homes, family farms and land are particularly vulnerable to this tax. Allowing 4 percent inflation to trigger indexing would help persuade investors to save and invest in capital assets instead of letting long-term inflation worries scare them into channeling their income into consumption.

One of the chief objections to last year's proposed capital gains cut was that it would lose revenues for the federal government. That wasn't true then, and it's not true now. More risk capital means more GNP growth, and that means more tax revenues. One Harvard economist estimates that a 15 percent flat rate would raise over $30 billion for the Treasury in three years. And the 4 percent indexing trigger would (according to the Congressional Budget Office's inflation projections) result in zero revenue loss, even using a static revenue model.

It is essential that we come up with a bipartisan, pro-growth capital gains reform bill. My bill is an olive branch to all sides of this debate—and a call to unity on the goals of American jobs, competitiveness and productivity.

THE KINDEST CUT OF ALL—REDUCING CAPITAL GAINS TAX

(By Robert W. Kasten, Jr.)

America is locked in the most serious competitive struggle of its 200-year existence. The arena is the world economy. And this is a fight we can't win with one hand tied behind our back—the kind of handicap a high capital gains tax imposes.

When investment in American productivity is reduced, all Americans get hurt—investors, businessmen and workers. The ones who suffer most of all are the neediest Americans—those whose very lifeline depends on the social safety net only a strong economy can provide.

One of the major reasons American competitiveness is in danger is the immense advantage given to foreign businesses by their own tax codes. This is especially true with capital gains taxes.

Capital gains are the return on investment, the benefit investors reap when they make the economy more efficient and productive. Countries like West Germany, South Korea, Taiwan and others have learned that encouraging investment is the key to creating national wealth. These countries impose no tax at all on long-term capital gains.

President Bush and I have proposed cutting our own capital gains tax to reduce America's competitive disadvantage. Opponents of this measure have hidden behind the demagogic and inaccurate charge that a capital gains cut is a "giveaway to the rich."

This is an age-old debating tactic: When the facts aren't on your side, try to foster envy, resentment and other base emotions. The problem is, America simply cannot afford the luxury of class divisions on this issue; the foreign challenge is too serious. If cutting the capital gains tax will help us compete, and help us create more and better jobs in America, then we must do it.

Is a capital gains cut a giveaway to the rich? Let's drop the rhetoric for a while and look at the facts.

First, we know that cutting the capital gains tax would increase the total amount of taxes paid by the wealthy. From 1978 to 1985, the top capital gains tax rate was reduced from just under 50 percent to 20 percent. According to the Treasury Department, gains realized by the top 1 percent of taxpayers increased from $31 billion in 1979 to $92 billion in 1985—and as a result, capital gains taxes paid by the wealthy more than doubled from $8.7 billion in 1979 to $18.4 billion in 1985.

A lower capital gains rate would help nonwealthy Americans in numerous ways. It would give them a greater incentive to save for their children's education, and for their retirement. At least 47 million Americans hold securities, either directly or through mutual funds subject to capital gains taxation. These investors have a median household income of $36,800, and own an average of $6,200 worth of stock.

The current high capital gains tax threatens to lower the living standard of 50 million Americans who have invested in businesses indirectly through private pension and retirement funds, as well as the 13 million elderly Americans who spend on income from pensions.

Although pension funds are not subject to the capital gains tax, the value of stocks in these funds is reduced by that tax. When we reduce the tax bite on the potential return from investment in stocks (i.e., the capital gain), the market price of the stock will go up. Example: After the 1978 and 1981 capital gains tax cuts, pension fund money flowed into growth stocks—and the value of the pension funds soared from about $400 billion in 1980 to $900 billion in 1986.

The 1986 capital gains tax hike increased the tax burden on middle-income families. The long-term capital gains rate rose 65 percent (from 20 to 33 percent) for upper-income taxpayers—and by considerably more for those in lower tax brackets. For example, in 1986 a family with a taxable income of only $30,000 faced an effective capital gains rate of 10 percent. Today, that rate is 28 percent—or 180 percent higher than in 1986.

Both my own capital gains proposal in the Senate and the President's plan are designed to reduce the tax burden on low- and middle-income taxpayers. My bill would apply a 50 percent exclusion for capital gains on certain assets from ordinary income tax rates. For taxpayers in the 15 percent income tax bracket ($0 to $29,750 taxable income for joint returns) the capital gains rate would drop to 7.5 percent. The President would allow a 45 percent capital gains exclusion—and exempt those with income under $20,000 from capital gains tax.

Alan Cranston of California, one of the most respected of Senate liberals, has pointed out that "[capital gains] is not a rich versus poor issue." He's right. The economic future of all Americans—from investors to the poorest of the poor—depends on bringing that rate down.

It's a tough world. Let's put the inflammatory and inaccurate "giveaway to the rich" rhetoric aside and give America a chance to compete in the world economy.

CUTTING CAPITAL GAINS TAX WOULD CREATE JOBS

(By Robert W. Kasten, Jr.)

I just introduced a bill in Congress that would create thousands of new jobs for Wisconsin—and already opponents are lining up to call it a massive giveaway to the rich.

It's yet another instance of politicians and political commentators letting their idology blind them to the truth—and I'd like to clear the air and let the facts tell the story.

My bill, the Entrepreneurship and Productivity Growth Act of 1989, would cut the tax rate on capital gains by 50%. Capital gains are the income investors get from investing in growing businesses. These gains are the reason people invest.

If you reduce the federal tax bite on these gains, investors will invest more of their money in businesses. This investment goes directly into new plants and equipment, and creates economic growth. That means jobs and rising incomes for working families.

We all hear the commentators on television and in the newspapers complaining about how Americans are losing jobs to foreign countries. Have you ever wondered why a job created in South Korea or West Germany couldn't have been created just as easily here in Wisconsin, for a Wisconsin worker?

The answer is simple. Countries such as South Korea, Belgium, West Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Hong Kong and Malaysia don't tax long-term capital gains at all. If you invest in businesses in those countries you get to keep the whole profit you make.

This also is one reason why many foreign products are of such high quality. We need to promote the investment in new technology that will raise the quality of American products.

West Germany investors invest in a German company and keep their profit. American investors invest in an American company and lose 28% of their profit to the federal government.

Many people who would invest in the American companies are convinced not to by the fact that our capital gains tax is too high (practically the highest in the whole world).

The result is that new companies in America—the small businesses that create the most new jobs—don't have enough investors willing to invest in them.

Who gets hit the hardest when this happens? Workers who can't find jobs—jobs that would have existed if only companies had been able to keep themselves afloat and on the road to growth.

When investors are discouraged from investing, they don't usually pull their money out of large, well-established companies such as IBM and General Motors. They tend to keep away from small, risky companies with a lot of growth potential.

Economist David Birch of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology recently concluded a study that shows that these high-growth companies—which make up only 7% of all companies—create a whopping 67% of all the new jobs in America.

Clearly, if making sure all Americans have a good job is important to us, we have to encourage investment in this kind of company just like the other growing industrial countries do. And that means cutting the tax rate on capital gains.

That's what my bill would do—and it would target the incentive not to investment in tax shelters such as paintings, vintage cars and collectibles, but to the kind of investment that will create the jobs of the future.

Look what happened the last couple of times we cut the capital gains tax. By cutting the tax in 1978 and 1981, we boosted investment in new high-growth companies from just $600 million in 1977 to $4.5 billion (that's right, billion) in 1983. This incredible explosion of investment helped spark the growth that created 19 million new jobs in this decade.

Look at all the Wisconsin success stories that were made possible by venture capital investment—innovative and job-creating companies such as Cray Research in Chippewa Falls and Supercomputing Systems Inc. in Eau Claire.

Wisconsin has one of the nation's brightest labor forces and a can-do work ethic. Combine that with a cut in the capital gains tax and Wisconsin can be America's next Silicon Valley.

The debate on the capital gains tax will boil down very rapidly to one question: Do we care about Wisconsin's future labor force? If we do, we'll cut the tax—and watch the prosperity of the average Wisconsin family grow steadily into the next century.

If we don't, we'll continue to let the high tax stifle investment—and blight the dreams of our children for a more prosperous future.

I'll be on the side of growth—and on the side of Wisconsin workers.

CURBING LBO'S THE EASY WAY

(By Robert Kasten)

President Bush has proposed the only surefire solution to the leveraged buyout craze—cutting the capital gains tax. Unlike other trumpeted LBO cures, this measure would curb some of Wall Street's excesses without threatening to throw the market as a whole into a tailspin.

Many in Congress are justly concerned about the surge in leveraged buyouts—corporate mergers financed by massive new debt. From a total of $11 billion in the years 1978-83, LBOs have risen to a total of $160 billion for the years 1983-88. The highly publicized $25 billion LBO of RJR-Nabisco has prompted an unprecedented congressional clamor to "do something"—anything—about LBOs.

Congress' uncertainty on how—or whether—to respond to the LBO craze was summed up by Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski: "There's an appetite here on the Hill to do something about it [but] we shouldn't have a meat-ax approach. There are some good things that come out of buyouts."

He's right. The empirical studies of LBOs that I have seen indicate that they increase our competitiveness by making business more efficient.

But I still welcome the congressional debate on LBOs—because it has created an opportunity to rethink the current tax code, which has created an excessive bias against savings and investment and thus encouraged the shift toward debt financing.

Our tax code also imposes a "double tax" on income that is saved and invested. An individual's return from investment is taxed once at the corporate level—and then once again at the individual level when the investor receives dividends. Moreover, interest on debt is deductible for businesses, while dividends paid out to stockholders are not deductible.

This double tax on savings and investment has tilted our financial markets away from long-term rewards, and toward short-term gains.

Most of the LBO solutions being widely considered simply wouldn't work. Cutting back corporate interest deductions would raise the cost of capital for U.S. firms, and encourage takeover bids by foreigners—who will still be allowed to deduct interest costs. Many analysts blame the 1987 Black Monday stock market crash on congressional efforts to limit the corporate interest deduction.

Allowing a dividend tax deduction—even in return for partial elimination of interest deductions—wouldn't work. It would not lower the overall cost of capital for U.S. firms vis-a-vis their foreign competitors. And while permitting deductibility of dividends would reduce the cost of capital, many remain concerned about the potential static revenue loss for the Treasury.

I believe the most effective way to solve the double-taxation problem, reduce the cost of capital, and help encourage equity financing is to reduce the unnecessarily high tax rate on capital gains. It's yet another double tax on investment—taxing both the future income stream and the capitalization of that stream.

A lower capital gains tax rate would turn the markets toward long-term equity investing, and away from interest income (like that from junk bonds) or short-term gains (like those from commodity options). Many prominent leaders in business and government agree with this approach. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said recently that lowering the tax rate on capital gains would encourage equity financing.

To maximize the impact of a capital gains cut, it's important to limit the tax incentive to long-term, growth-oriented investment in corporate stock. An across-the-board cut in the capital gains rate would, in fact, encourage long-term investment. But it would also promote investment in real estate and collectibles trading, and encourage the kind of tax-sheltering activity that atrophied the economy back in the 1970s.

My new capital gains bill (S. 171, the Entrepreneurship and Productivity Growth Act of 1989) and President Bush's proposal would limit the capital gains differential to certain capital assets. While the president's proposal would apply the tax break to the sale of bonds, land and other non-depreciable real property, our goals are the same: encourage long-term equity financing and reduce the overall cost of U.S. capital.

Unlike a dividends-received deduction, a capital-gains tax cut would result in an immediate revenue gain as stockholders realize their capital gains. In 1978, we cut the tax rate from 50 to 28 percent—and tax revenues rose $2.6 billion in 1979 and $3.4 billion in 1980. And revenues would continue to grow in the future as stock values rise and the economy expands.

While LBOs may not be the economic Freddy Krueger that critics like to portray in speeches and opeds, they nonetheless point to a disturbing tendency in today's market. It's the apparent tilt toward the immediate gratification of paper profits as opposed to long-term commitments to restoring America's competitive edge.

We need to put the long term back on business' agenda. And restoring the capital gains differential is a good start.

[From the Washington Times, Feb. 9, 1989]

THE COMING BUDGET DEBATE—KEEPING THE CAPITAL GAINS PLEDGE

Today, President George Bush makes good on the campaign promise for which he took the most heat from candidate Michael Dukakis: to propose lowering the tax rate on capital gains to 15 percent.

Massachusetts Gov. Dukakis charged this would be "a $40 billion tax break for the rich." Mr. Bush's budget reportedly argues that lowering the rate will actually generate from $2 billion to $3 billion in higher tax revenues the first year, and as much as $6 billion to $8 billion more over four years.

Recent history clearly supports those estimates. What's significant is that not only were they developed by the carefully nonpolitical staff of the Office of Tax Analysis, but for the first time the OTA supports the research of Harvard supply-side economist Lawrence Lindsey; who has just joined the White House staff and who has long argued that lower rates would raise income.

This means that the tax sensitivity analyses developed in May 1988 by Assistant Treasury Secretary Michael Darby along with Treasury economists Robert Gillingham and John Greenlees have finally prevailed over the old static analyses of the OTA, which just last year said gains rate cuts were losers.

This is good news because, according to Mr. Bush's point man on Capitol Hill on this issue, Republican Sen. Robert Kasten of Wisconsin, "The ingredients are here for developing a bipartisan consensus we lacked a year ago to do something about regaining lost ground on capital gains. The mood is now in favor of fixing the mistake."

The 1986 Tax Reform Act raised the top effective tax on gains from 20 percent to 33 percent, a 65 percent increase, by taking away the entire capital gains exemption. As a result, even though we cut the marginal rates dramatically; we raised the already high U.S. tax cost of capital by about 10 percent.

In 1985, a study done under the direction of Paul Craig Roberts of the Center for Strategic and International Studies showed the U.S. tax cost of capital was already about 55 percent higher than that of Japan, which doesn't even tax capital gains.

The 1986 act not only worsened that competitive position, but it quickly proved the basic supply-side thesis that changing tax rates affects economic behavior. (See table.)

As soon as investors knew that the capital gains tax rate was going to rise by 40 percent to 65 percent in 1987, there was a rush to take and declare gains in 1986. Total revenues from this tax soared nearly 90 percent and $22 billion in 1986, and may have fallen back by as much as 60 percent in 1987.

There is nothing new in this effect. Between 1968 and 1976, legislation authored by Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts pushed the capital gains top rate up from 25 percent to 49 percent. The idea was to increase the tax take from the wealthy, but revenues actually fell in constant dollars by 33 percent, and most of this decline was in taxes paid by the top 1 percent of taxpayers.

This evidence was so clear that when Mr. Kasten's late compatriot, Republican Rep. William Steiger of Wisconsin, proposed to cut the rate back to 28 percent, he got bipartisan support to enact it in 1978 over the protest of President Carter, who said it would cost $2 billion a year.

Instead, by 1979 revenues were 42 percent higher than they had been at the 49 percent rate in 1976. But that experience was modest compared to what happened after the 1981 Reagan tax-cut law took effect. From 1982 to 1985, capital gains revenues at the new lower 20 percent top rate almost doubled in constant dollars, before Tax Reform nearly doubled them again in advance of the higher rate in 1987.

This was the main reason the share of income taxes paid by the top 1 percent jumped from 18.1 percent in 1981 to 26.1 percent in 1986, a very "progressive" trend that, ironically, was reversed by killing the exemption, not to mention its other bad side effects.

For example, financial experts have also observed that killing the six-month holding period tax incentive increased stock market volatility as speculation began to replace investment decisions.

Source: U.S. Treasury Department.

In turn, this tended to favor quick gains from takeovers and mergers, while punishing real growth and dynamic enterprise, where the rewards take longer to arrive. Richard Kopcke, economist for the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, says the 1986 tax law "should increase the equity values for all mature corporations," but "the higher tax rate on capital gains will tend to depress the equity values of the 'growth stocks' that do not promise their shareholders dividends until many years have elapsed."

Mr. Kasten believes that if Mr. Bush makes jobs and competitiveness the issues, it will be hard for Congress to resist. But some think the fight might be much easier to win if the goal were merely indexing all capital gains for inflation, leaving the rate alone.

The irony is that that approach, though perceptually "fair" and less of a "tax break," might actually be a major revenue loser, since most capital gains are the result of inflation, while a rate cut would definitely result in higher tax revenues.

JAMES R. CROWLEY WINS OUTSTANDING TEACHER OF THE YEAR

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we all know that our schools will never be any better than the men and women who teach in them. Recently, a teacher in my State received a prestigious award and I would like to use this opportunity to congratulate him.

James R. Crowley, chairman of the electronics department at Blue Hills Regional Technical High School in Canton, MA, has been voted "Outstanding Teacher of the Year" by the American Vocational Association Trade and Industry Division.

Mr. Crowley has received numerous awards for teaching. Last year he was nominated for a Christa McAuliffe fellowship. He was also nominated to be the Massachusetts Teacher of the Year.

Mr. Crowley is a graduate of Northeastern University and also has a master's degree in electrical engineering from Fitchburg State College. He has taught at Blue Hills High School for 23 years.

In the words of the director of Blue Hills High School, "Jim Crowley is a credit to his profession and a credit to Blue Hills. He has shown by example the many ways an individual can contribute to the development of tomorrow's leaders."

I am grateful to Mr. Crowley and other teachers like him who have make a lifelong commitment to excellence in education. I hope that the other Members in the Senate and the citizens of Massachusetts will join me in extending congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Crowley.

JOHN LENTINE TO COMPETE IN INTERNATIONAL SKILLS OLYMPICS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a recent high school graduate in Massachusetts who attended the Blue Hills Regional Technical School will represent the United States in an important international competition.

John Lentine, a 1988 electrical trades graduate will represent the United States in the International Youth Skills Olympics in Birmingham, England, in August 1989. He was selected after a 3-day competition in November 1987, sponsored by the Vocational Industrial Clubs of America.

Clearly, Mr. Lentine has exceptional abilities. I know that Mr. Lentine is continuing to work on his skills in preparation for this summer's competition.

I want to send Mr. Lentine my heartiest congratulations. In an era where talk about the shortcomings of American schools and students are commonplace, it is especially important that we recognize these special students and schools who continue to strive for excellence.

I hope that the other Members of the Senate and the citizens of Massachusetts will join me in congratulating Mr. Lentine and in wishing him the best of luck.

JOHN W. CAMERON WINS NEH TEACHING AWARD

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we all know that our schools will never be any better than the men and women who teach in them. Recently, a teacher in my school received a prestigious award and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him.

John W. Cameron, a high school English teacher at Dana Hall School in Wellesley, has been selected "Massachusetts' NEH/Reader's Digest Teacher-Scholar for 1989" by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The award provides Mr. Cameron with an opportunity to undertake an intensive research project entitled "Reclaiming our Humanity Through Twentieth Century Literature, Music, and Art." During his sabbatical he plans to study authors that show "renewed faith in the human spirit' in their works.

Mr. Cameron holds a master's degree in English from Wesleyan University. He has taught at Dana Hall School for 13 years and currently serves as the president of the New England Association of Teachers of English.

I am grateful to Mr. Cameron and other teachers like him who have made a lifelong commitment to excellence in education. I hope that the other Members in the Senate and the citizens of Massachusetts will join me in extending congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Cameron.

VOLUNTARY NATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Representative JOE BRENNAN of Maine recently wrote a column for the Portland Press Herald discussing national service that lays out very well the rationale that is the basis of the national service proposal introduced by Senator SAM NUNN and Representative DAVE MCCURDY.

I believe Congressman BRENNAN's column makes a strong case that voluntary national service is a good way to channel the idealism of America's citizens, primarily the young, while providing a broader opportunity for upward mobility to more of our citizens.

And while doing so, Congressman BRENNAN points out that national service also offers the means to provide the essential human services needed to meet the unmet needs of millions of Americans. And it creates the potential for every young American, through his or her own effort, a chance to improve their stake in life.

Mr. President, I have said a number of times that I believe enactment of national service legislation that meets the needs of this country, offers Americans a worthwhile and challenging opportunity to serve and passes the test of fiscal responsibility will be one of the priorities of the Senate over the next 2 years.

I commend Congressman BRENNAN's column to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NEW START: REVIVE SPIRIT OF PUBLIC SERVICE

(By Joseph E. Brennan)

Over a quarter of a century ago, President John F. Kennedy delivered his famous inaugural address in which he challenged Americans to "ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country."

President Bush's inaugural address reiterated this message when he said, "We are not the sum of our possessions. They are not the measure of our lives. In our hearts we know what matters. We cannot hope only to leave our children a bigger car, a bigger bank account. We must hope to give them a sense of what it means to be a loyal friend, a loving parent, a citizen who leaves his home, his neighborhood and town better than he found it."

It's good to see that the new president is moving away from the messages and questions of the past few years, which tended to promote selfishness and mean-spiritedness: "Are you better off now than you were four years ago? How's your bank account?" It's refreshing to see Bush challenge Americans to think beyond their pocketbooks.

Peculiar role models and events have occurred in the past eight years. There has been a marked shift from public spiritedness to an unabashed pursuit of self-interest. Corporate raiders, insider traders, Wedtech, the Pentagon scandal and "kiss and tell" books by high-ranking public figures come to mind. Success, to many, has come to be equated with material gain.

The pursuit of self-interest is reflected in the attitudes of many students. College freshmen in recent years have rated "being materially well off" as being more important than "developing a meaningful philosophy of life."

Why are young people so concerned with accumulating wealth? Probably in part because two of the most important investments for one's future—a college or other post-secondary education and a home—are becoming prohibitively expensive for many average Americans. Since 1980, the costs for public and private colleges have risen 70 percent and 90 percent respectively, while family income has risen only 33 percent.

The end result is that students and their parents are not able to meet the total cost of their education; therefore, those who choose to pursue a degree potentially face staggering debts. With annual expenses of up to $20,000, that debt could run to $60,000 or more for an undergraduate degree alone.

Instead of starting with a clean slate, these students look forward to years of debt repayment.

Many residents of Maine are no strangers to rapidly increasing housing costs. The Maine State Housing Authority lists the median selling prices of homes at $115,900 in York County, $123,134 in Cumberland County and $90,138 in Kennebec County. In 1970, about 80 percent of Maine households could afford a median-priced home. Now only 35 percent can afford such a home. The home ownership rate nationally for people ages 25 to 34 has dropped by almost 20 percent during the 1980s.

With these expenses to look forward to, it's no surprise that our young people might appear to be so concerned with money. Have they been given a choice?

In addition to these difficulties, another disturbing development has emerged. The defense of our nation has become the disproportionate responsibility of minorities and sons and daughters of low-income families.

Although comprising only 14 percent of the U.S. population, minorities fill 38 percent of today's Army ranks. This is not right. Defense of the nation should be the responsibility of all Americans. It should not fall so disproportionately on minorities and low-income families.

How can these inequities and financial challenges for our young people be overcome? The situation is far from hopeless. A number of proposals have emerged that offer possible solutions. A voluntary Citizens Corps, which was proposed by a group of American political leaders is particularly intriguing. It would create a voluntary national service.

Basically, the proposal is for a new GI Bill. People between the ages of 18 and 26 could choose to serve in either the military or civilian corps. In addition to subsistence wages, a participant would be credited with either a $20,000 voucher for civilian service or a $24,000 voucher for military duty after two years of service. Upon completion of service, this voucher could be used for college, job training or as a down payment on a home.

It has been estimated that 85 percent of those who join the program would join the civilian service and the remaining 15 percent would enter one of the armed services.

Proponents hope the popularity of the program among young people would attract those with less financial incentive to join. Historically, the attraction to civic duty has brought many young people from a variety of financial backgrounds to serve their country in VISTA and the Peace Corps, despite the negligible wages.

In addition to meeting the country's military defense needs, other battles could be fought in peacetime America: battles against illiteracy, homelessness and drug and alcohol abuse.

Citizens Corps volunteers could address some of the unmet needs of our society: individual attention to children in overcrowded or understaffed schools and child care centers, to the sick in hospitals, to the elderly in nursing homes, to the mentally retarded and to the homeless. Volunteers could see firsthand the needs of their neighbors, develop a sense of civic duty and compassion and build a foundation for their own futures.

Instead of creating a new bureaucracy, this proposal would expand existing voluntary programs for which state and local governments would be predominantly responsible. And it would replace most existing federal student financial aid programs—now costing $8 billion—at an additional annual cost of $5 billion.

The concept of national service is not new. Most democracies, with the prominent exceptions of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada, require or encourage some type of service as a condition of citizenship.

Undoubtedly, the proposed Citizens Corps plan is ambitious. Questions and potential problems still need to be worked out, but the goal of maintaining a sense of public spiritedness is a noble one and crucial to maintaining the integrity and greatness of our nation.

Historian Edward Gibbon observed that when "the Athenians finally wanted not to give to society but for society to give to them, when the freedom they wished for most was freedom from responsibility, then Athens ceased to be free."

Voluntary national service would once again give young Americans the opportunity and encouragement to serve their country. Instead of being automatically entitled to education, job training, or home-ownership benefits, the young people of America could experience a sense of the responsibilities as well as the entitlements of citizenship.

IF FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE COULD SEE THEM NOW

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, in late December 1987, in response to reports of widespread difficulties involved in the recruiting and retaining of registered nurses, the Secretary's Commission on Nursing was established. The Commission concluded that the shortage of registered nurses is real, widespread, and of significant magnitude, and recommended sustained attention to promote positive and accurate images of the profession and the work of nurses.

The media has often depicted nurses in a negative light and has given an inaccurate picture of the work that they do. The general public for the most part remains unaware of the various roles that highly specialized nurses perform and their contributions to today's health care.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following article from the Washington Post, written by Abigail Trafford, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IF FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE COULD SEE THEM NOW

TV IMAGE OF NURSES HITS NEW LOW, AND REAL NURSES ARE UP IN ARMS

They squeal a lot, these cute little hormonettes with long flowing shampoo-ad hair, their bouncing bosoms harnessed in push-me-up bras, every muscle aerobically sculpted from tip to toe. The simplicity of it: hair, tits and legs. They've even brought back the old Brigitte Bardot baby doll sex pout—and these girls pout a lot. For them, it's creative thinking because when they speak, their brain wave patterns scarcely register. Mostly what these creatures do for an hour is sigh, sob, giggle and bounce.

Meet the "Nightingales," the stars of the new NBC series on prime-time television about a group of nursing students.

It's not just that Florence Nightingale, that very Victorian founder of modern nursing, would be appalled; she'd probably start her reform movement all over again. This program is a good illustration of why nursing schools are having trouble attracting able applicants and the country is facing an acute nursing shortage.

Who, after seeing this farce, would want to be a nurse?

There are lots of good reasons for going into nursing, of course, but as the recent government Commission on Nursing found, the American nurse has a terrible image problem. In a television age where life often follows art, the commission concluded that unless the image of nursing is changed in the media, the real problems that undermine the profession—low wages, high-stress working conditions, lack of power and autonomy within the health-care community—will be a lot harder to solve.

Not that you see much of the real world of nursing in the "Nightingales" television soap. The script, which ranges from nubile frolic to psycho violence, involves a handful of bedside bimbos who live in a Victorian Gothic sorority house near the hospital where they are training to be nurses.

There's a lot of dialogue about sex and men and references to "Dr. Buns"; scenes of wet hair, bare legs and wrap-around towels; the usual mix of kooks and cokeheads. In fact, the professional aspects of nursing and medicine play a very minor role in this program. It might as well be called "The Aerobics Sisters," since the Nightingales themselves seem to spend more time in a gym than in the hospital.

The star of "Nightingales" is Head Nurse Suzanne Pleshette. With her liquid grave voice and her aura of elegance, she is a relief from the hormonettes. But not much. The script is terminal, and not even an actress of her talent and stature can resuscitate it. She's supposed to present a good image of nursing—the professional, career-minded nurse who runs a department in a big hospital. But she, too falls into the bad old sterotype of the sensuous, scheming playmate in search of Dr. Right. Without any apparent power in the hospital, she uses guile and sex appeal to manipulate the system, which means getting a doctor to do her a favor. Not to put too fine a point on the inanity of it all, but in what is cast as a masterful power play, she withholds the doughnuts from the doctors' lounge until she gets a reserved parking space.

Most of her bosom-heaving and poignant pauses between cliches have to do, not with nursing skills in the ICU, but with—you guessed it—Dr. Right, an attractive widower whose wife was her best friend. He's an old male chauvinist, but a good man is hard to find and he's catching on about sensitivity. He admits he's just a jerk, adding that he's so glad she points it out because that's just what his wife used to do. Chances are, if the show lasts a few more weeks, they'll fall into each other's arms.

In keeping with the negative stereotype, even the chief of nursing in "Nightingales" seems destined to fulfill the image of nursing as a get-a-man job rather than a professional career.

One 60-minute episode ends with a ceremony where the nursing students get their little caps to show that they're really going to be 20th-century Nightingales. All dressed in long black gowns, the hormonettes gather around Pleshette, who pays homage to Founder Flo for bringing nursing out of the Dark Ages. Then she lights a candle that lights the candles of the little Nightingales. But instead of looking like noble guardians of a proud tradition, they seem more like members of a Twilight Zone witches' cult.

MEDIA CRUSADE

After an hour of "Nightingales" (10 p.m. on Wednesdays), it's an understatement to say that nursing has an image problem. Not surprisingly, nurses across the country are up in arms over the program. After the pilot movie was aired last year, the American Nurses Association received hundreds of complaints about the show. As ANA president Lucille A. Joel wrote to Brandon Tartikoff, president of NBC Entertainment: "When a program such as 'The Nightingales' movie present lax educational standards, questionable motivations to become a nurse, substance abuse and promiscuous behavior as images to portray nurses and nursing education, you can expect that nurses, people who devote their lives to caring for people will be upset."

The series is a toned-down version of the movie, and there are awkward attempts at dealing with the issues facing nursing today, but these are overwhelmed by the many scenes of hair and legs, bounce and pout.

Still, the series forces nurses to look at what's going on in their ranks, for "Nightingales" reflects some common public perceptions about nursing.

"The image problem is extremely serious," says Carolyne Davis, a registered nurse who was chairman of the national Commission on Nursing. "In media portrayals, the nurse is like a child, a harmless sex kitten."

One result of this poor image is that from 1983 to 1987 there were fewer graduates from nursing schools, as well as a decline in enrollments. In 1988, the number of students entering nursing school rose, according to a survey published in Nursingworld Journal, but many schools reduced grade requirements to attract more candidates.

In 1987, Health and Human Services Secretary Otis R. Bowen set up the commission to explore the reasons behind the shortage and recommend ways to boost the supply of nurses.

The 25-member advisory panel found that teachers and guidance counselors rarely recommend nursing as a career. "Students are talked out of it," explains Davis. "Teachers tell them, 'you're too bright to be a nurse.'"

"I wish I could line up every guidance counselor in the intensive care unit to see what nurses really do. Then I bet you'd want the best and brightest right here."

Image isn't the only problem. Relatively low wages, increased work loads, lack of decision-making authority and limited career advancement in the health care industry are also factors in turning people away from nursing. Unless all these issues are addressed, the nursing shortage will only get worse—and so will the quality of care in many facilities across the country.

"No one wants to go into a profession that is powerless," says Pamela Miraldo, a PhD nurse who is chief executive officer of the National League for Nursing. "Women don't do that anymore. If you empowered the nursing role, nurses could go a long way to address the serious problems that are eating away at the social fabric—drugs, AIDS, the homeless—and general aging of the population."

After a year of hearings across the country, the commission concluded that the shortage not only was widespread but likely to get worse. Hardest hit are large urban hospitals. For all community hospitals, vacancy rates have increased from an average of 4.3 percent in 1983 to 11.3 percent in December 1987, the latest figures available. Health officials estimate that 165,000 nurses are needed right now to fill current vacancies.

Of major concern is the fact that the qualifications of students who are interested in nursing have declined at a time when the role of nurses has become more complex and demanding. The Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores of nursing students are well below the national average for college-bound students. Moreover, the gap between SAT scores for nursing and non-nursing students seems to be widening. The national failure rate on the July 1988 nurse licensing exam reached a record of more rates above 20 percent.

The 16 specific recommendations in the commission's final report are aimed at upgrading the nurse's role, improving the quality of nursing candidates and increasing the supply. A key recommendation focuses on image. "The media has often portrayed nurses in a negative light and given an inaccurate picture of the work they do." concludes the commission. "An immediate and concentrated effort to correct this misperception is called for."

In short, the idea is to transform the perception of the American nurse from hotpants bubblehead to competent health care professional.

Armed with an $800,000 grant from the Pew Charitable Trusts, a Philadelphia foundation that supports health and social research, American nurses are about to begin their media blitz, from carefully crafted "infomercials" on the new and improved nurse to consciousness-raising scripts about today's high-tech/high-touch Florence Nightingales.

"It's a crusade," says Davis. "What we're saying to nurses is that we really value you."

DEEP THROAT AND HOT LIPS

How did this happen, you might ask. Here was Florence Nightingale—angel of mercy, courageous heroine, pure-minded reformer, a woman of class, independence and vision. Sure, she challenged the medical establishment just as nurses are doing today. But never was there a nurse so highly valued in her own time and by future generations.

What is interesting is that the sex object image is relatively recent. It started in the mid-1960s and flowered in the 1970s. By a quirk of history, just as the women's movement was opening previously closed doors, the nursing profession headed for decline. If women now could be doctors, bankers and lawyers, why would they choose to be nurses?

In a provocative study, "The Changing Image of the Nurse," Philip A. Kalisch and Beatrice J. Kalisch of the University of Michigan trace the public's perception of nurses since the 19th century.

As a predominantly female occupation, nursing closely reflects the status of women in society. The reality may be twisted in books and movies, but popular fiction reflects the major social currents that continually redefine the role of the sexes, the status of work and family, the dominant values and rules of a culture. As a result, Florence Nightingale has gone from Angel of Mercy through World War I to Fun-time Flapper Girl Friday in the Twenties, to Heroine under Stress during the Depression and World War II, to housewife and mother in the Baby Boom '50s and finally to sex object from the 1960s to the 1980s.

The past 30 years have been tumultuous decades for social change. In 1963, Betty Friedan's book "The Feminine Mystique" exploded the myth of bliss for suburban moms. In 1968, Kate Millet's "Sexual Politics" chronicled the sexism in every aspect of American life. Both became best-sellers.

The image of women generally began to change, especially the perception of working women. They went from a lower-class to an upper-class image. Rosie the Riveter of World War II was back in the public eye as a Supermom corporate lawyer flying to Zurich for business with her "reach out and touch her baby at home" telephone credit card.

Paradoxically, while women generally advanced in social status, nurses did not. In fact, they slipped further down the social ladder. Much damage was done to their image when one of the most popular porn movies ever made introduced the world to Nurse Lovelace in "Deep Throat" in 1972. Forget about mopping the brow or taking a patient's pulse, or even giving up her job to be the little Mrs. to Dr. Right, the way June Allyson did in the 1953 movie "Battle Circus." Nurse Lovelace had one career goal and it wasn't CPR or marriage. "Linda Lovelace was declared a nurse simply on the basis of her abilities to perform fellatio, and she went right to work in the clinic to relieve others of their sexual problems," write the Kalisches in their study.

The image triangle of sex, humor and nurses became entrenched. Between 1966 to 1984, nurses were featured in the titles of X- and R-rated sexploitation films ahead of wives, hookers, cheerleaders and stewardesses. Consider the forgettable lines in "Night Call Nurses," released in 1972: "Why kid around? Touch therapy doesn't go far enough?" and "Who says all men are created equal?"

For general audiences, television brought Americans Margaret (Hot Lips) Houlihan, the nurse in "M*A*S*H," the TV series about a field hospital in the Korean War that ran from 1972 to 1983. Although Hot Lips evolved from an obnoxious, busty, stuck-up, sex-driven head nurse into a good-guy professional member of the medical team, who can forget the scene in the shower or the time she's all wired up in bed with the commander?

Meanwhile, the kinky factor got more perverse and ominous in the media image of nurses in the mid-1970s. Another type of nurse emerged in the public psyche: the Nazi frigid Mommie Dearest S & M virgin vampire. It's Nurse Ratched in "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" (1975); it's Nurse Diesel in Mel Brooks' "High Anxiety" (1977); it's Nurse Jenny Fields in "The World According to Garp," the 1978 best-seller by John Irving.

As the old-money parents of Jennie say: she is "slumming her life away as a nurse."

FROM HAG TO HEROINE

In the 19th century, there were two opposing nurse images identified by Philip and Beatrice Kalisch. The first was Sairy Gamp, the alcoholic hag in Charles Dickens' "Martin Chuzzlewit." Untrained, uneducated, unclean and unreliable, Nurse Gamp is lower than a domestic servant. The other image is Florence Nightingale, whose role in the Crimean War was heralded in a series of newspaper articles. American poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow paid tribute to her in his 1857 poem "Santa Filomena," calling her the "lady with a lamp," the "saint of the Crimea," "a noble type of good, Heroic womanhood."

It was Dickens' exposure of the Sairy Gamps of nursing that paved the way for Nightingale's reforms. Yet the dichotomy of saint vs. sinner, high-born vs. low-class, tender mercy vs. chilling abuse, has persisted in the public image of nurses.

The nurse as noble heroine lasted through World War I. Then in the 1920s, a time of economic boom and short skirts, the media image shifted to not-so-noble unprofessional helpmate. "Nurses were seen as subordinate to physicians and, more important, placed larger emphasis on love than on their work," the Kalisches point out. In short, nursing became a get-a-man career. While romance and marriage dominated the "The Trial." (She finds all accused men attractive and so makes love to them.)

Interestingly, in the 1930s, the hardest economic times of this century, the image of nursing improved significantly. According to "The Changing Image of the Nurse," the media portrayed nursing as a real profession that required education and skills; "Nurses were depicted as brave, rational, dedicated, decisive, humanistic and autonomous."

The heroic, patriotic image continued in wartime movies such as "To the Shores of Tripoli" (1942) and "So Proudly We Hail" (1943). In these movies, the nurses are professional, courageous, self-sacrificing and perfectly at ease at working alongside men. The film "Sister Kenny," starring Rosalind Russell as the nurse who revolutionized the rehabilitation of polio patients, enhanced the image of nursing even more. Here was a women who defied male doctors to bring better care to patients.

In the postwar baby boom era, nurses' image changed again with the times:

"I'll keep a nice house for you . . . I'll read all the clever magazines so I'll be able to say smart things to your friends . . . And when you're sick I'll nurse you . . . I'll pretend I'm a patient. Then in your private office we'll make love." So says military nurse June Allyson to Army surgeon Humphrey Bogart in the 1953 film "Battle Circus."

It's not exactly what Florence Nightingale would have said after returning from the Crimean War. Even Hot Lips Houlihan from "M*A*S*H" would have gagged on the lines.

But as the Kalisches' study makes clear, the media image of the nurse paralleled the dominant perception of women at the time as submissive helpmates, loyal and romantic, not too bright, but inspirational—a kind of moral prop for men. Since then, it's all been downhill to today's image of the nurse as dumber, kinkier and less trustworthy than her colleagues of past generations.

What the national Commission on Nursing is calling for is the return of Florence Nightingale as noble careerist who will help overhaul health care in this country to meet the changing needs of society.

Certainly the stage is set for a revitalized role for nursing. Given the high costs of care, the specialization of doctors and the chronic problems of most diseases, nurses see themselves in a ideal position to provide quality care to a wide range of people who aren't sick enough to see a doctor but are still sick enough to require medical attention.

"That's the message we want to get across," says the Nursing League's Miraldo. "There's a lot nurses can do—in collaboration with doctors, not in a subservient mode. Then we'd recruit talented men and women."

A good place for nurses to start on their media crusade might be with the scriptwriters for "Nightingales." Put Suzanne Pleshette on the hospital board—(it's easier to get a parking space that way), upgrade her education and sense of humor and give her a social life that includes more than playing moral prop to that horny, simpering widower doctor or den mother to those deranged hormonettes. Instead of all those shampoo scenes and heavy pouting, what about some real nursing action in the coronary care unit?

Think about it: the next time you're in the hospital and ring for the nurse, who would you like to get? A Bedside Bimbo? An Angel of Mercy? A Nazi Vampire? Sairy Gamp? Or Florence Nightingale?

SCOUTS OF AMERICA

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise today to honor the Scouts of America and recognize a special group of Cub Scouts who are visiting us today. My wife and I have had the pleasure of serving as den parents for Cub Scout Den 4 of Pack 666 and we have gained a new appreciation of the value of scouting as well as a deep gratitude for all of the adults who work so tirelessly to help young people through scouting.

To celebrate President's Day last week, Den 4 Cub Scouts prepared essays on a number of our earlier Presidents and discussed them at the den meeting. Jamie Poist described the life and career of George Washington. Derek Wilcox wrote about Thomas Jefferson. Andrew Steele did his essay on James Monroe. Charles Darling discussed the work of Andrew Jackson. Carter Morris wrote about Abraham Lincoln. Sam Bond described the career of Ulysses S. Grant. And Cabel Hobbs wrote about Teddy Roosevelt. In the discussion period the Cub Scouts noted that it was significant that these outstanding Presidents had suffered major reverses in their lives yet they did not let the disappointments deter them from service to their country. It is important for all of us to realize that disappointments and temporary setbacks afflict even the most successful. The Cub Scouts have a better understanding that coming back from adversity is an important challenge for all of us.

Founded on February 8, 1910, here in the Nations Capital, the Boy Scouts of America is an organization dedicated to citizenship, character building and physical fitness. Chartered by Congress in 1915, its goals today remain the same as stated then:

To promote, through organization, and cooperation with other agencies, the ability of boys to do things for themselves and others, to train them in Scout ways, and to teach them patriotism, courage, self reliance and kindered virtues using the methods which are now in common use by the Boy Scouts.

I am certain that there are many in this body that have lasting memories of Scout camping trips and the many adventures experienced.

President Bush has stressed the importance of volunteer service organizations to help promote a kinder and gentler nation. The Boy and Girl Scouts of America are such organizations that benefit all involved.

For the youth of America, the Scouts offer experiences which helps prepare them for the challenges of life. For the many adults that volunteer their time, the scouts allow them to interact with youths to impart their knowledge and experiences while promoting service to their community. The Scouts stand strong as a symbol of service to others and dedication to the ideals have made America great.

In closing, I am proud to honor the Scouts of America and the positive role it plays for all involved.

AMERICAN HEART MONTH

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, by a joint resolution in 1963, Congress requested the President to issue annually a proclamation designating February as American Heart Month. At one of his first ceremonies as the 41st President of the United States, George Bush, a former American Heart Association [AHA] volunteer, signed the 25th anniversary proclamation. During American Heart Month, I encourage my colleagues to join me in saluting the American Heart Association's efforts to achieve its mission, the "reduction of premature death and disability from cardiovascular diseases and stroke," the leading cause of death in the United States.

In order to accomplish its mission, the American Heart Association, a nonprofit voluntary health organization funded by private contributions, its 56 affiliates, and approximately 2.4 million volunteers, has made disease prevention its top priority. Since 1949 the AHA has contributed more than $754 million in research, second only to the federally sponsored National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute [NHLBI] in the amount devoted to cardiovascular research. In its 1988-89 fiscal year, AHA expects to spend more than $63 million to finance hopeful scientific studies. The AHA reports that in addition to its national research program, in 1988-89 its 56 affiliates are supporting 1,118 new research awards.

I am proud of the Alaska Affiliate's contribution to this effort. During this period, they are supporting a University of Alaska, Fairbanks' School of Fisheries & Ocean Science study of blood flow to the heart and its relationship to low oxygen levels in seals.

Together the respective research, prevention, and education programs of the AHA, the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute [NHLBI], and the National Institute of Neurological Diseases and Stroke [NINDS] have made great strides in the battle against cardiovascular diseases and stroke. AHA reports that from 1976 to 1986 the age-adjusted death rate from heart attack declined by 27.9 percent and that from stroke fell by 40.2 percent.

Unfortunately, the battle has not been won because these diseases are still the No. 1 killer in the United States, claiming nearly 1 million lives each year. According to the AHA, in 1989 heart attack will strike approximately 1.5 million Americans, killing over 500,000 and that stroke will affect around 500,000, killing about 150,000. In addition, more than one in four Americans suffer some form of cardiovascular disease. The AHA estimates that the cost associated with cardiovascular diseases in 1989 will be an estimated $88.2 billion in medical expenses and lost productivity.

Mr. President, this Nation has the potential to make continued progress in the fight against this No. 1 killer; however, additional advances are contingent on sufficient Federal funds. I urge my colleagues to reaffirm our commitment to reducing death and disability from cardiovascular diseases and stroke by devoting adequate Federal funds for biomedical research, prevention, and education.

I ask unanimous consent that this year's Presidential proclamation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[A Proclamation by the President of the United States of America]

AMERICAN HEART MONTH, 1989

Twenty-five years ago, the Government of the United States of America proclaimed its cooperative support of the fight against the Nation's leading killer—heart disease. This year, as in each year since, that support continues.

Diseases of the heart and blood vessels will claim the lives of nearly one million Americans this year. About one-half of all deaths each year are attributed to cardiovascular diseases—almost as many deaths as cancer, accidents, respiratory diseases, AIDS, and all other causes of death combined.

Nearly 66 million of our citizens, more than one-fourth of our population, suffer from some form of cardiovascular disease. High blood pressure alone threatens the lives of more than 60 million Americans age 6 and older. Heart disease strikes regardless of age, race, or sex. Its toll in human suffering is incalculable.

The American Heart Association, a not-for-profit volunteer health agency, estimates the economic cost of cardiovascular diseases in 1989 will be more than $88 billion in lost productivity and medical expenses. Each year, cardiovascular diseases account for more than 2 million years of potential life lost, based on a life span of 65 years.

But we are making progress. The American Heart Association and the Federal Government, through the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute, have been working together since 1948 to find better ways to prevent cardiovascular diseases and stroke and inform the public and educate the medical community about the most effective techniques to treat these diseases. Most recently, the National Cholesterol Education Program was instituted to educate consumers about the dangers of high cholesterol levels. At the center of the National Cholesterol Education Program is its coordinating committee of over 20 member organizations representing major medical associations, voluntary health organizations, community programs, and Federal agencies involved in health and cholesterol education.

Medical advances such as new surgical techniques to repair heart defects, improved pharmacological therapies, emergency systems to prevent death, and knowledge to prevent heart disease from occurring have significantly reduced premature death and disability due to cardiovascular diseases and stroke. From 1976 to 1986, the age-adjusted death rate for cardiovascular diseases dropped 24 percent. But there is still more to be done. One American dies of some form of cardiovascular disease every 32 seconds.

Cardiologists and other health professionals are seeking to reduce the risk of heart disease, stroke, and atherosclerosis. By encouraging Americans of all ages to control high blood pressure, stop smoking, reduce their intake of cholesterol, saturated fats, and sodium in their diets, and exercise regularly, many deaths can be prevented.

The Federal Government supports a wide array of cardiovascular research projects and encourages all Americans to reduce the risks of heart disease by maintaining good health habits.

The American Heart Association and its more than 2.4 million volunteers have contributed to this effort through their support of research and the shared commitment to educate Americans about the need to adopt a sound regimen of proper diet and exercise.

Recognizing that Americans everywhere have a role to play in this continuing battle against a major killer, the Congress, by Joint Resolution approved December 30, 1963 (77 Stat. 843; 36 U.S.C. 169b), has requested the President to issue annually a proclamation designating February as "American Heart Month."

Now, therefore, I, George Bush, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the month of February 1989 as "American Heart Month." I invite the Governors of the States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, officials of other areas subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and the American people to join me in reaffirming our commitment to combating cardiovascular diseases and stroke.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-first day of February, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and thirteenth.

GEORGE BUSH.

UNITED NATIONS HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT ON CUBA

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I would like to introduce into the RECORD a statement Ambassador Armando Valladares, our representative to the U.N. Human Rights Commission, made last week in Geneva applauding the United Nations for its first-ever Cuban human rights report.

The report paints a graphic picture of the repression that has been visited upon the Cuban people by Fidel Castro, who after 30 years in power, is now the longest running dictator in Latin America.

What makes this report so valuable is its balanced and factual approach. According to Ambassador Valladares, the report "does not judge the facts but rather shows in an impartial manner what the Cuban Revolution has denied for 30 years: The fact that there are violations of human rights in all categories and dimensions, almost without exception."

U.N. officials received "137 complaints of torture, cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment" during their 10-day stay in Cuba last September. Moreover, the U.N. accused the Cuban officials in their report of breaching their promise not to harass those who complained about human rights abuses before the Commission.

Mr. President, I believe Ambassador Valladares deserves our thanks and congratulations for a job well done. As a result of his leadership, we have reached the point where the United Nations has finally addressed widespread human rights violations in Cuba.

This is due in no small part to the unflagging efforts of Ambassador Valladares, who himself was a prisoner in Castro's jails for 22 years. His release in 1982 came about as a result of an international campaign of protest.

Because of his experience, Ambassador Valladares understands just how important a report like this can be in focusing attention on the repressiveness of the Castro regime.

I commend his statement to my colleagues and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES PLEASED WITH UNITED NATIONS REPORT ON CUBA; STATEMENT BY AMBASSADOR ARMANDO VALLADARES, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE TO THE UNITED NATIONS HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION, FEB. 24, 1989, GENEVA, SWITZERLAND

Today is a great day for the United Nations. After reading the Report from the Cuba Work Group (CWG), I can tell you that, on balance, we are pleased. The report reflects and gathers the official version of the Cuban reality, but it also received the accusations, documents and testimonies of the people, the victims. We applauded the dedication of the CWG under Ambassador Alioune Sene's chairmanship, as well as the time and effort put into the physical production of the report by the Secretariat.

This report does not judge the facts but rather shows in an impartial manner what the Cuban Revolution has denied for 30 years: the fact that there are violations of human rights in all categories and dimensions, almost without exception. There are well-documented violations and even official admissions of these violations on the part of Cuban functionaries.

The report demonstrates that the constitutional and legal system is structured contrary to the letter and spirit of internationally accepted human rights standards.

I think you may not have had time to read it, but the essence of the report, the compendium of all the denunciations, can be found in the annexes.

There are cases of torture, missing people, religious persecution, violations of all the civil and political rights and violations of economic and social rights. For instance, the Working Group received denunciations of massive beatings. In Chapter III, paragraph 4, the Minister of the Interior admitted that in the past detained individuals and prisoners were beaten and that Cuban laws were draconian.

In the annexes—legally a part of the report itself—you will find a copy of the sentence of Ruben Hoyo Ruiz, convicted solely for the possession of one Bible and you will find the sentence of Arturo Garcia Rebollar, accused in a surrealistic trial for the possession of a translation of the prophecies of "Nostradamus." The National Union of Writers and Artists of Cuba (Union Nacional de Escritores y Artistas de Cuba—UNEAC) decreed that those predictions made 500 years ago were anti-Soviet.

On the other hand, the Cuban government lied to the Working Group; one of the times they told the Working Group that the Quivican Prison had been shut down. This is false. Comments in the Annex of the Report prove this. The Cuban authorities also transformed the punishment and torture cells in the Prison of Combinado del este to deceive the Commission. But photographs were taken of these transformations and they clearly document the deceptive measures. Finally, we have been able to discover that the Cuban Government lied to the Working Group citing false numbers on the statistics of public health in Cuba. Official United Nations statistics prove this. The same was done with numerical figures on education and housing.

The Cuban Government gave the Group and President Sene guarantees that there would be no reprisals taken against those who came to testify. This has not been the case; dozens of people have been arrested and beaten. These people burned their bridges when they openly testified to the Commission. The report speaks of reprisals, and these people must not be abandoned; the international community has a commitment with them. That is why I feel this process has just begun. You will see in the report that there are hundreds of questions which the Group directed to the Cuban Government for its comments, but they have not been answered. Thousands of cases of allegations of violations of Human Rights were sent to the Cuban Government on August 29, 1988; the Cuban Government has not even issued a return receipt. Subsequently, 1500 other cases which were sent have not received any reply either. The questions on the Constitution and the Penal Code have not been answered, either.

The final consideration, the most important one and one which deserves undivided attention, is a clear recommendation for the process to continue; in other words, the need not only to maintain, but also to reinforce the spirit of international collaboration on this case.

In conclusion, I want to repeat that today is a great day in the struggle for human dignity. The truth always comes to light. There is the report. You will see that in Cuba Human Rights are violated, there are cases of grave violations; for example, during its visit to Cuba the secretariat on behalf of the group received a total of 137 complaints of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of punishment, missing people, murders, lack of freedom of religion, lack of freedom of expression or thought, lack of all fundamental liberties.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONRAD). The time for morning business has now expired. Morning business is closed.

OMNIBUS COMMITTEE FUNDING RESOLUTION FOR 1989 AND 1990

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 4 p.m. having arrived, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 66, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 66) authorizing biennial expenditures by committees of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Will the Chair advise the Senator as to the time agreements as they relate to Senate Resolution 66.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair is pleased to do that.

The agreement that has been entered into includes 30 minutes to be equally divided between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Alaska. On the resolution there is 1 hour equally divided. On the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, there is 1 hour equally divided. On the amendment of the Senator from California, there is 1 hour equally divided. There is an additional 15 minutes that has been allotted to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FORD. Now, let me repeat that to be sure this Senator understands it. On Senate Resolution 66, there will be 30 minutes equally divided between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. FORD. Second, there is an amendment by Senator HELMS of North Carolina on which there will be 1 hour and 15 minutes, 30 minutes equally divided, with an extra 15 minutes going to the distinguish Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. FORD. And then on the amendment of the Senator from California, there will be 1 hour equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That, too, is correct.

Mr. FORD. I thank the chair very much. My distinguished friend from Alaska is here and we will proceed under the consent to the consideration of Senate Resolution 66.

Mr. President, today we are considering Senate Resolution 66, the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1989 and 1990, which authorizes expenditures for committees of the Senate. The accompanying report, 101-3, explains it in detail. The ranking member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the senior Senator from Alaska, and I have worked closely on this authorization.

On October 12, 1988, the Rules Committee sent to all Senate committees budget packages for 1989 and 1990. Our guidelines to committees at that time were that the total increase for committees must be consistent with the fiscal year 1989 legislative branch appropriations bill which mandated that any pay raises for fiscal year 1989 shall be absorbed within the levels appropriated in that act.

The Rules Committee then notified all committees on January 10, 1989, that for the 1989 funding period ending February 28, 1990, each committee's salary baseline may be increased by 10 percent over the 1988 salary baseline reported in Senate Report 100-287. Likewise, the 1990 salary baseline could only be increased by 2 percent, the amount requested by the President for the fiscal year 1990 January COLA. In addition, committees were instructed that they could budget the 1990 January COLA for 2 months at 2 percent and the 1991 January COLA for 2 months at 3 percent.

At that time, all committees were again put on notice that any increases in the salary baselines were dependent upon the availability of appropriations included in the legislative branch appropriations bill for fiscal year 1989. Committees were also informed that it was the Rules Committee's intention to fully comply with the mandate of absorbing salary increases within the levels appropriated. Most committees closely followed the Rules Committee's guidelines in requesting funds for the 2-year period.

In the past, Rules Committee authorizations have stressed frugality, with authorized adjustments made only for the yearly COLA. In 1989, a 4.1-percent COLA increase in salaries was authorized. That figure, subtracted from the 10-percent guideline, left only 5.9 percent for real growth over the 2-year period. On a yearly basis, that amounts to just 2.95 percent in real growth.

Mr. President, the Rules Committee guidelines for committee funding for 1989 and 1990 will retain an austerity policy, and will keep the total authorized amount for the biennial budget period within available appropriations.

I would like to state for the record that the Banking Committee has made a good, justified case for an increase beyond the 10-percent guideline to hire 16 additional staff. In order to address the special needs of the Banking Committee's increased workload, Senate Resolution 66 contains funds for nine staff positions on a nonrecurring basis for 2 years. One new staff position requested will be absorbed within the 10-percent guidelines recommended by the Rules Committee. Funding for six additional staff positions has been included on a recurring basis. I would like to point out, Mr. President, that the budget base for committee funding for the 102d Congress will be the recurring amounts only. In the future, special needs of committees will continue to be considered and funded only on a nonrecurring basis.

In summary, the recommended 1989 recurring funding is $51,986,059. The recurring funding authorization for 1988 was $47,002,568. In 1989 recurring funds recommended are 10.6 percent greater than the 1988 recurring budget authorization. The recommended 1990 recurring funding is $53,042,703 which is only 2 percent greater than the 1989 recommended recurring funds.

Mr. President, the committee budgets for 1989 and 1990 recommended by the Rules Committee are not lavish. In considering Senate Resolution 66 today, I recommend that we approve the budgets as requested.

One last point I would like to make for the record is in regard to section 24 of the resolution. This section revises Senate policy on mass mailing to make Senate policy consistent with the current policy of the other body.

Mr. President, there are several points I feel need to be emphasized. No. 1, funding authorized in this resolution falls within the existing available appropriated funds. No supplemental appropriations will be required. The resolution is a biennial authorization for the 101st Congress. A rather austere funding policy will continue for Senate committees. When COLA's are considered, these recommendations permit less than 3 percent real growth each year of the 101st Congress. No real growth was authorized in the last budgets, so we have been on a very tight budget for each of the last 2 years and this budget for the next 2 years is extremely tight also.

A new policy is initiated to fund special needs from nonrecurring funds rather than an incremental increase in the budget base that stays on and on, long after the exceptional workload of the committee subsides.

Let me explain that, Mr. President. In this particular budget cycle, the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs is faced with several major questions, one being the savings and loan issue in this Congress. The Rules Committee agreed that extra funding was needed for this committee to handle that tremendous workload. But rather than build these funds in the budget base, the Rules Committee recommends to the Senate that the amount authorized be nonrecurring. This means that these funds will not be a part of the budget base for the next funding period in the 102d Congress.

Next, Mr. President, the resolution also includes a provision on Senate official mail. The revision makes a Senate policy on official mail consistent with the policy of the other body. Last year, the other body spent over 95 percent of the dollars appropriated for franked mail for both bodies. Only $54 million was appropriated for 1989 with the expectation that in the Senate that $27 million would be carried forward from 1988, making $82 million available in 1989.

Since the House has spent $77 million, the $27 million carried forward that was on the books is not available; no money. Therefore, only $54 million is available in the current year. Under existing policy, the Senate would assume one-half of this amount as available for the Senate. This would mean a 40-percent reduction in franking privileges from last year for some Members if no changes were to be made. I see no fairer resolution, Mr. President, to this issue than consistency between the two bodies so long as there is a single appropriation fund.

Let us remember that each constituent has one Representative and two Senators, yet the other body outspends the Senate for franked mail by better than a 2-to-1 ratio. Will it cost more? That depends on the practice under the new policy. For Members who do not mail newsletters now and do not mail them under the new policy, the cost will be the same. If a Member increases his mailing, the cost will increase. But the Rules Committee, as it has in the past, will carefully monitor these costs.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me repeat: Existing available appropriations are adequate to cover the funds authorized in Senate Resolution 66, and I urge its adoption. No supplemental appropriation will be necessary because of this authorization.

I yield to my good friend from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 66 is different than committee funding resolutions reported out of the Rules Committee in prior years. Last fall, on September 22, 1988, the Committee on Rules and Administration reported out favorably Senate Resolution 479, an original resolution to amend rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate. Senate Resolution 479 was agreed to by the Senate on September 30, 1988. The purpose of that resolution was to authorize the Rules Committee to report 2-year authorizing resolutions (biennial budgets) for committees of the Senate and to report one authorization resolution (omnibus resolution) for either a 1- or 2-year budget period.

Senate Resolution 66 should be adequate for the biennial period and not require a supplemental to the authori-zations. In providing for the needs of the Senate committees during the next two committee funding periods, the amounts included for authorizations in the aggregate have stayed within the available appropriations funded in fiscal year 1989.

I stated at the opening of the committee budget hearings and want to reemphasize now, those of us on the Rules Committees do not expect to come back with a supplemental request. Committees are on notice that they should be very careful in managing their budgets. My desire is to see that the new committee biennial budget works.

This desire has led me to side with the chairman, and ranking member of each committee. We have sided with the committee chairman and ranking member of each committee when questions have arisen concerning funding of those individual committees.

On the other hand, I must state that I do not think that the Rules Committee has been generous with the committees. We have through these consultations brought in I believe a resolution with minimal funding to meet the needs as outlined by the various committees especially in view of the challenges that the individual committees face in the coming 2 years.

I concur with the remarks of my good friend from Kentucky and point out that the section 24 of this resolution dealing with changes in mailing allocations should bring about an equality with the House of Representatives on the use of mass mailings. It is long overdue. I support this resolution. I will have more to say about the mass mailings at a later time, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHAFEE. I wonder if I might ask a question. Whose time can I take it from?

Mr. FORD. Take it from mine.

Mr. CHAFEE. I have some time coming up on the question on the Helms resolution, but I would just as soon use the time now as these same questions pertain.

Mr. FORD. We only have 30 minutes on this. The Senator has an hour and 30 minutes on the Helms amendment. I would appreciate it under the time restrictions.

Mr. CHAFEE. If anybody else wants time now, I will hold up.

Mr. FORD. I do not think we have anybody who wants time. The time would be available when Senator Helms lays his amendment down.

Mr. STEVENS. We have reserved our time, Mr. President, so we might answer questions at a later time. We just have 30 minutes divided between the two of us on the resolution itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, is there any objection to my taking 10 of my minutes of the 15 minutes I had on the Helms amendment and using the time?

Mr. FORD. No objection.

Mr. STEVENS. No objection.

Mr. CHAFEE. Furthermore, if I do not use that 10 minutes now, I would like to yield that back to the balance that I have on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, if I might direct a question to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, in looking over the budgets for the various committees, if I might first just briefly run down them—and I am running them down in the order of the amounts that they receive—there are 19 total committees that are receiving money. I will not go through them all. I will go through the top ones. Labor—under this amendment—has about $5 million and 124 employees; Governmental Affairs, again, close to $5 million and 120 employees; Judiciary, $4.7 million and 138 employees; and Appropriations, $4.7 million.

Then you get to a committee that is, I think, as busy as any committee in this Congress, the Finance Committee which is number seven.

It does not have $5 million; it has $2.7 million, less than $2 million, or nearly 50 percent less than the Labor, Governmental Affairs, and Judiciary Committees, and I recognize that I am rounding my figures a little bit here. That I do not understand.

In other words, my question to the distinguished chairman of the committee is: On what basis are these allocations made? Is it a historic basis that powerful chairmen once upon a time were in these major committees and built up substantial payrolls?

I do not think anybody on this floor would suggest that the Judiciary Committee has a heavier burden than the Finance Committee. I recognize that the Judiciary Committee has numerous judicial selections come before it, and they must investigate those, but, in all fairness, that is done by the FBI.

So I would just like some enlightenment to see on what basis this is done.

Mr. FORD. I say to the Senator that in some respects I agree with what he is saying and the questions he is asking, but we were reasonably meticulous with the chairmen and ranking members of each committee. They came before the Rules Committee and laid out their need for this money, based on the number of pieces of legislation that come through their committees, the number of hearings they hold, the number of consultants they need in various and sundry areas.

So we limit the growth and we have limited the growth to basically the COLA for the staff and a 3-percent growth. The larger the committee and the larger the funding, 3 percent seems like it is a larger amount. But I asked each one and instructed each chairman and ranking member that once this committee budget is in place, then we will have the committee look at zero budgeting.

We are going back to the basic need of the committee. We will start at zero and then have them come before the committee and tell us why they need to go forward.

The problem is, yes, these committees are larger. Take the Judiciary Committee: They have had hundreds and hundreds of judicial appointments. The Senator said the FBI does most of the work, but there is work by the committee. There are all kinds of Justice Department things that go to the Judiciary Committee. I am not here to defend any one committee over the other. The only thing I know is that the chairman and ranking member came before the committee. They made their case, and in the judgment of the Rules Committee, based on what they asked us for and the criteria we set, we approved the budget from which the Senator is reading.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on our time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island controls the time at this point. So if anybody is seeking time, it would be off his time.

Mr. CHAFEE. My time is going to run out very quickly. Ten minutes goes fast. Could they possibly respond on their time? Would that be fair?

Mr. STEVENS. I am happy to respond using some of the balance of my time for just one comment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the Joint Committee on Taxation. I defend the concept of joint committees because of the use of shared staff. They prepare the revenue estimates used by both the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees; $4.422 million is spent in the Joint Committee on Taxation. We take that fact into consideration when we look at the level of funding for the Finance Committee in the Senate as compared to other committees. They do not have a joint committee on the judiciary, but the Finance Committee has a Joint Committee on Taxation.

As a matter of fact, there is another joint committee, a Joint Economic Committee, that also overlaps to a certain extent the functions of the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee.

It would be hard to take a committee and say, "Look, we have a greater function than you, and you have more money than we have." Therefore you should be cut. We have had a balance, I think, in terms of these committees. We must look at factors such as the services of joint committees.

I agree with the statement of the Senator from Kentucky regarding the historic aspect of some of these committees. But there is an ongoing funding basis for committees now, and both the chairman and ranking member, and I might say, by inference, all other members of the committees, supported the request that came to us.

I might say that there ought to be members here from the individual committees defending their staff and budget levels, and not let the burden fall just on the Rules Committee, which has already held their request down.

Mr. CHAFEE. Well, I am not here to be a nitpicker or a complainer. I do not want to use the Finance Committee as an example. I am not the ranking member, and I am not the chairman. The distinguished Senator from Alaska is absolutely right, that there is a Joint Committee on Taxation, but I think it is also fair to point out that that committee deals with trade, Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security, catastrophic illness—all of those mammoth problems.

The thing that bothers me is that what happens is that by giving an across-the-board percentage increase of 10 percent, basically what you have done, and I know it shades a little bit, is to compound inequities.

In other words, if a committee is getting what you might say is too much, by giving it 10 percent, you are giving it 10 percent of $5 million, a lot more than 10 percent of $2.7 million. I am not saying the other committees are starved. I do not think there is a single committee here than cannot get along with the amount that the Rules Committee has given them. I am not here to plead for more. I am here to say that it just appears that we are being extravagant.

If indeed you are going to so-called zero budgeting, starting at the beginning and examining, now, why does the Labor Committee have to have 124 employees and more money—twice as much as the Agriculture Committee and the Banking Committee? If you are doing zero budgeting, when does it start? As I understand, that is a 2-year budget.

Mr. FORD. That is correct. They would start at the beginning, hopefully, of the 101st Congress, at the oversight hearing.

Mr. CHAFEE. The 102d.

Mr. FORD. The 102d; I am sorry. We will have oversight and begin to work methodically and have hearings periodically, and hopefully at the end of this Congress, we will be able to make a recommendation to all the committee chairmen that will be satisfactory. It will be irritating to most of the chairmen.

Mr. CHAFEE. No question.

Mr. FORD. I hope that the Senator respects my reluctance to get into it, but I intend to do that, and I suggested that to every chairman and ranking member that came before the Rules Committee. Yes, there is a historical base here, but it is also a base that we held down for the last 2 years at zero.

Now, this year we are giving a modest 3 percent. When one looks at the Finance Committee and at all the costs of the information that is needed for the committee, it has gone up more than 3 percent. They are absorbing a great deal of inflationary costs, and that will be a 4-year period, not just a 2-year period, because we zero based them for the last 2 budget years, and only a modest 3 percent increase average over the next 2 years. So when you take the COLA's that all of our employees are entitled to and you give that to the chairman and ranking member to pay both the majority and minority, then you find yourself in a little less than 3 percent average growth over the next biennium.

Mr. CHAFEE. Well, I do not want to beat this to death here, but the distinguished Senator from Kentucky mentions 3 percent several times. As I look at this, this was roughly 10 percent. Is the Senator saying because it is over 2 years?

Mr. FORD. No. There is a 4.1-percent COLA that is automatic. That is the pay increase that all Government employees received, or Senate employees received. Take that 4.1 from the 10, and it gives you 5.9, and 2 percent for the next year, and that is a little over 7. So it is roughly a little better than 3 percent or average 3 percent growth over each of the next years beyond their normal pay raise that the Senator's staff, the committee staffs, earn, and other employees are also entitled to it.

Mr. CHAFEE. The Senator means outside of pay, which is the COLA's?

Mr. FORD. That is correct.

Mr. CHAFEE. It is 2 percent or 3 percent, whatever it may be.

Mr. FORD. Roughly around 3 percent average over the next 2 years each year.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will you yield a second?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. That includes the increase of cost of training, travel, subscriptions, everything; at a time when the cost of living is 4 percent, we are requiring the committees to hold their office cost down on an annual basis. I am sure the Senator understands that.

We did limit the Committees in terms of their possible expansion.

Mr. FORD. I might say to the good Senator we have already started monitoring workload productivity and ranking for the Senate committees and we can tell the Senator almost to the committee how they rank in productivity, how they ranked in workload, and how they ranked in employees versus the number of hours spent. So we are beginning to get into it, and hopefully we are on the right track and one that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would agree with.

Mr. CHAFEE. I believe that probably uses my time anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 36 seconds remaining.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator for his efforts in this in trying to get some kind of a rational, if I might say, basis to establish on what basis the budgets are approved, that is, the workload. It has obviously got to be more than bills considered or bills. In another committee I am on, the Environment Committee, something like the clean air bill is one bill but it is a monstrous bill and to equate that——

Mr. FORD. You have to take those by sections. You have various sections on that bill and have to look at time spent on hearings and hours of staff input in order to come up with the workload to substantiate whatever budgets we look at as it relates to the zero budgeting procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator CHAFEE's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. I will yield him my time.

Mr. CHAFEE. I guess we are all going to be here in the 102d Congress, so I look forward to seeing this zero-based budget come into effect because I think it is the right way to proceed.

I know the chairman has a very difficult job. No one comes to him and says, "Cut my budget," and indeed I did not. I appeared before him and, like a stalwart, I stood for my committee budget. Who does not? I guess it is the feeling everybody wants to be treated fairly. If something is to be had, they want it proportionately, obviously.

I commend the distinguished chairman and ranking member to look at this from a fresh look, even though it is 2 years away. I hope it is successful.

Mr. FORD. Let me just say to my good friend that we look forward to his input. We ask him to come before the committee and testify and to make a record as it relates to how his feeling is as to the appropriations or the appropriations for the various and sundry budgets.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from California.

AMENDMENT NO. 7

(Purpose: To strike the provision in the resolution that would abolish the present spending cap on use of the Frank by Senators)

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] for himself and Mr. NICKLES, proposes an amendment numbered 7.

In the resolution, strike out section 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have many times taken to the floor of the Senate to complain about our abusive use of our Constitution privilege of the frank—the right to send mail without concern for the cost.

Mr. President, I am concerned about the cost, for as the old saying goes, there is no free lunch; there is also no mailing privilege. It may be free to the Members of Congress. It is not free to the taxpayers.

Someone must pay for the millions of dollars in costs we run up each year sending out only slightly veiled campaign literature—so-called newsletters—and that someone who must pay is the American taxpayer.

It is bad enough that in an election year the Congress is spending more than $100 million of our constituents' tax dollars on our own mass mailings. And it is even worse that we are outspending our appropriations—we are overdrawing our mailing account each year—so that we must provide supplemental funds bills just to make up the difference.

The resolution now before us would authorize a magnificent leap in expenditures which we lavish upon ourselves—a leap so large that it would make Superman proud; a leap so large that it would make the 50-percent pay raise proposal appear almost modest.

Last year—an election year—the Senate spent approximately $35 million on mail costs. If the proposed section 24 of the resolution were in effect, the total limit on our spending—and I use the word "limit" with tongue planted firmly in check—the limit would have been over $180 million. That is an increase of more than 500 percent.

You might say, "No, this cannot be. No one would suggest such an outrageous increase." But it is true.

I mean, a 500-percent increase. And we complain to physicians about the spiraling cost of doctors' bills and what they ask in the way of Medicare reimbursement.

One thing is for certain, when it comes to parsimonious Federal budgeting, this will be viewed quite appropriately as a grab for self promotion, proving the old adage that charity begins at home.

First, I must give credit to Roll Call, a local newspaper, that covers the scene behind the scenes on Capital Hill.

Mr. President, this headline reads: "Senate Unleashes Frank Mail, Dramatic and Costly Increase Expected."

They have not overstated the case.

If it were not for this article in the current issue of Roll Call, I confess I would not have known about this attempt to increase this funding fivefold. Certainly I would not have learned of it merely from the face of the resolution nor from the Rules Committee report.

Some of the numbers that I have used come from Roll Call, but we have independently verified those.

Under present Senate rules, each Senator is limited to spending a certain amount on mail costs. This amount is determined by splitting the total congressional mail appropriation in half—half to the House, half to the Senate—and then allocating that total to each Senator on a per capita basis with a few adjustments for small States.

Section 24 of the committee funding resolution would abolish this limit that restrains spending. In its place, it would restrict one category of mail, that for postal patrons, that is to say those mailings of material that are simply delivered to every mailbox in a specified area—countywide to statewide—without a specific addressee. The limit would be 6 mailings per year under this postal patron limitation, which for my State would mean a so-called limit that would permit the mailing of approximately 65 million pieces of mail per year. That is just for me. If my colleague were to do it, it is $130 million.

This "limit" would not affect mailings of notices of town meetings, which last year, when there was a limit, cost more than $3 million.

This so-called limit would also not restrict mass mailings when the addressee is specified. So, this limit would actually not restrict mailings of newsletters, as long as any sent in excess of six postal patron mailings per year were individually addressed.

This proposal is not a limit; it is an invitation to excess.

Let me inform my colleagues as to how I arrived at a cost of $180 million.

Consider the following numbers: First, each piece of mail sent out in a presorted mass mailing costs approximately 13 cents; second, there are approximately 103 million mailing addresses nationwide. If you multiply the first number by the second, that is the 13 cents by 103 million mailing addresses and then multiply that number by two, since each State has two Senators, then mulitply that number by six, since six postal patron mailings are permitted under the so-called limit, you come out with an amount that is in excess of $160 million. When you subtract out existing costs for postal patrons—to avoid double counting—then add the approximate costs of sending town meeting notices and mail specifically addressed to an individual, the total conservatively estimated reaches $180 million. And even this huge number does not take into account a separate decision by the Rules Committee to abolish the paper allotment system, which was another limit on mail that has now been removed.

One point here is worth extra emphasis: The proposal in section 24 places no limit on newsletters that are individually addressed, so the $180 million figure may be much too conservative. It only limits the newsletters sent out as postal patron mailings.

In other words, after milking the Treasury for the cost of sending out six statewide postal patron newsletters, a Senator could conceivably send out an unlimited number of newsletters that are individually addressed. In the past, prior to the limits of Senate Resolution 458, this profligacy appeared to be possible. However, it was not possible due to the paper allotment system, a limitation in the amount of paper that each Senator could use have for the purpose of newsletters. Now that we no longer have a paper allotment system, unlimited mailings would be possible, with the public, as always, being stuck with the bill.

Many of us, certainly on this side of the aisle, and I think on the other, as well, complained last year about the cost of federally financed campaigns as proposed by the so-called campaign finance reform bill. We did not think the public should pay for our campaigns. We did not think that to be the most urgent call upon the Treasury at a time when we were looking for ways to cut the deficit by cutting spending for other services.

Well, as wrongheaded as we thought that proposal, it would have cost a modest amount when compared to the cost that section 24 of the committee funding resolution would impose to finance this vastly expanded mailing of congressional newsletters.

Mr. President, I continue to oppose taxpayer subsidies of campaigns and campaign materials, whether it be in the direct form of so-called public campaign financing, or in the indirect form of the abuse of the franking privilege. That is why I continue to oppose the use of any taxpayers' money for congressional newsletters.

But I am compelled to be a realist. Unfortunately, each time that I have sought to abolish newsletters, I have lost, either on the floor of the Senate or in conference with the House. I would offer an amendment today to the resolution now before us to abolish funding for newsletters, to fund the franking privilege by which they are sent, if I thought that sentiment had gained any support in the Senate, if there had been any change of heart. Unfortunately, I do not have any evidence to suggest that sufficient change of heart.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I cannot simply stand by idly when an attempt has been made to, as roll call has, I think, accurately stated it, unleash this system to allow a fivefold increase in the cost for our self-promotion.

We simply must not expand the present system one iota. Therefore, I have sent to the desk an amendment that would strike section 24 from the resolution by maintaining the status quo which, it seems to me, is quite expensive enough for the taxpayers.

It is my understanding that the Rules Committee, under existing law, could have made the changes contained in section 24 without the action of the full Senate. In light of the impact of the proposed change, I commend the committee for seeking direction from the full Senate rather than acting alone. This is a matter that deserves full Senate attention in the full light of day.

I also urge the committee, should my amendment pass, to reinstitute the paper allotment system and to bring to the Senate a resolution extending the spending cap contained in Senate Resolution 458 of the 100th Congress.

Mr. President, even if the House insists on continuing its profligate ways, we should not follow its example. It does nothing for us to conform our practices to that of the House of Representatives. It simply invites further excess on their part.

Mr. President, I oppose the proposed expansion of mass mailings. I, therefore, ask my colleagues to support this amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Who yields time?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventeen minutes remains to the Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma such time as he may desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask my good friend and colleague, Senator WILSON, if he has included me as a cosponsor of his resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I did.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator.

I wish to compliment him for his amendment. I also was preparing an amendment to do the same thing because I think if we allow section 24 as presently in this resolution we would be committing a serious mistake, a mistake that would be very, very expensive, a mistake that would be probably one of the more expensive things that we have done in Congress in a long time.

Section 24, for my colleagues' information—and if they are not aware of it, they could look at it in the Senate Resolution 66 as reported out by the Rules Committee—section 24(a) reads:

S. Res. 458 agreed, to September 9, 1988, is hereby repealed.

What that repeals is the paper and the dollar limitations that apply to the Senate. I think it would be a serious mistake to repeal those limitations. If we repeal them, we are going to, quite frankly, be spending a lot more on mail. Right now, we already spend a lot of money on mail. As a matter of fact, we are spending more than what has been appropriated.

I am on the Appropriations Subcommittee for the Legislative Branch. I am aware of some of the difficulties coming about, but if we repeal this, we are going to be looking at significant cost increases for Senate mail.

If you look at the paragraph under section 24, it basically states that a Senator is entitled to franked mail but may not exceed an amount equal to 6 multiplied by the number of addresses to which such mail may be delivered in the State from which the Senator was elected. In other words, you could mail postal patron to every household six times on franked mail. That is enormously expensive.

I have heard people say, "Well, they do that in the House." They can mail six times into their district, and many do. That is enormously expensive as well. A wrong in the House should not be equalled in the U.S. Senate.

What we should do is bring the House to comparable limitations in paper and in total dollar costs to what we do in the Senate. Now we will work on that effort when we are working on the legislative appropriations bill. History has been that, well, the Senate would not tell the House what to do and the House would not tell the Senate what to do. But I think we are all responsible for taxpayers' dollars and we should not continue this practice of unlimited House mailings.

Mr. President, If we do not pass the Wilson amendment, we will have unlimited mailings for the U.S. Senate, total, complete, unlimited mailings.

We just, by one section, repeal the paper and dollar limitations and by the other paragraph, paragraph (b), we say we can mail six franked postal patron mailings to every household in the districts or in the State, and not included in that limit would be any mail which would be really just a notification that the Senator is in the State for a town meeting or some other notification type mail. So actually you could mail many times above six franked mailings to every household in the State. In many States, in South Dakota, for example, that may not be enormously expensive. If you do that in the State of California, it is quite expensive.

So again I compliment my friend and colleague from California for trying to restore some fiscal discipline. If we allow this resolution to pass as it is now crafted, we will not have any fiscal discipline.

What we will have is an unbelievable increase in the cost of Senate mail. As Senator WILSON said, I think it is $30 some million, at the present time, to as much as $180 million, just for the franked mail itself. That is not being responsible. It should not happen. I hope this the Wilson amendment will pass.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Oklahoma. He has been a real leader in the effort to try to curb this abuse.

Mr. President, how much of our time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California retains 12 minutes and 20 seconds.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

It is interesting how pious we can become on certain cases and when the motive of those who have given diligent thought to trying to work out something is to make us equal.

My dad always told me that when somebody is for something, it costs very little; but when somebody is against something, it costs a whole lot.

So, that is what we find here. Six mailings. Where is the appropriated funds? It is only $50 million. We want half of it and we want to share the same as the House does. But we are talking about $160 million.

Look at the appropriated funds and see how much is there. We want half of it. We want to be on the same playing field as the other body.

Let me give you an example. This year they are outspending us 76 to 24 percent now. Do you know why? It is all coming out of one fund. You do not have any money to spend. Try to mail one after today and see what happens to you. You cannot mail a newsletter after today. Your franking privileges are over.

Yet we say we are going to spend, and this unleashes all this stuff. Well, give us an opportunity to go to the well equal with the House and, if they want to, set up separate funds. When you set up separate funds, then the light will be on us and the light will be on them. That is the effect of this resolution. If the Senator does leave it in there and does not try to take it out, the Senator will find that we can make some progress.

But, no, we have to say it is going to cost $160 million.

Let me give one example. In 1987 the Senate's one-half of the appropriations for franking mail that year was $40.7 million. The Senate only spent $19 million, of what we assume was our half. Leaving almost $21.7 million savings.

The House spent $44 million. They took up all our savings. We are not saving anything. We are just curtailing the ability of our Senators to mail to their constituents.

The House mails six newsletters annually to their constituents in their districts and they do not hear from my colleague. They do not hear from my colleague but maybe one time. Maybe one time. We are entitled to two, or twice that amount, because we represent all of them.

So, when we began to look in the 1988 appropriations, it was $82 million, plus the $27 million carryover, for a total of $109 million.

The Senate's half of the 1988 appropriations would have been $41 million. The Senate spent $36 million, leaving a savings of $5 million.

The House spent $77 million, its half, the $27 million carryover, the Senate savings, plus $4 million. They spent it all. We save it, they spend it.

Let us make some changes. Let us get equality in the pot, equal in the appropriated line item, and then let us go from there with the light on both the House and the Senate.

The Senator is not saving anything. My colleague can stand up and say we have unleashed all these things. You have to come back for a supplemental. If you want more than the $50 million, you have to come back for a supplemental. Unless you vote for a supplemental, you do not spend any more money. And right now, given the $160 million I heard, and all the ripple effects there awhile ago, we need $110 million more. And there has to be a supplemental, because only the $50 million dollars are already appropriated.

Every constituent in our home States has one Representative and two Senators. The history of postal expenditures is opposite. They think they have got two Representatives and one Senator.

Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will be rejected and at the proper time, as soon as time is yielded back, if the Senator wants to yield his time back, at a given point I will move to table the amendment by the Senator from California and the Senator from Oklahoma. Then I will ask that that vote be set aside because there are several of our colleagues who are downtown. That would give them an opportunity to come back and we would have votes back to back, if that is acceptable to the other side.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I yield an additional 3 or 4 minutes to my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator from California.

I am going to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question before he runs off.

Mr. FORD. I am not going to run off.

Mr. NICKLES. Just for clarification. On section 24, when it says, "Senate Resolution 458, agreed to September 9, 1988, is hereby repealed," am I not correct that that resolution deals with the limitations on the total cost of mail which we have applied to the Senate and, if we repeal that, we will be taking off the cost limitations for Senate mail?

Mr. FORD. We only get one-half of the appropriated money. We assume that. So that there is no unleashing in any unlimited amount, Senator. We have $50 million that has been appropriated for this type of mailing. We feel that we are entitled to one-half of that and, under the circumstances, regardless of what you might read into it, that is all we are going to be able to have. Unless you get a supplemental, you cannot go beyond that.

What you are reading into this situation is that we are asking that the restrictions applied to the Senate are the same ones that are applied to the House; or left. So that puts us on an even playing field. Then we could go from there.

But unless you appropriate the funds, they are not going to be spent. Unless you and I vote for a supplemental, they are not going to be spent.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, to make sure that my colleagues are perfectly clear on what this resolution does, Senate Resolution 458 is a resolution which was agreed to September 9, 1988. It deals with mass mailings. It deals with mail costs. And it deals with limitations on each Senate office.

We are repealing that, if we agree to this as submitted by the Rules Committee.

One other comment. This idea that we are limited by appropriations: that is not the case. It should be the case. I see the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is with us on the floor. We should not be able to spend any more than we appropriate for mail costs. But that is not the case.

Present law states—and I will tell my colleagues I am going to endeavor to change the present law—but the present law says that "payment made under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be deemed payment for all matter mailed under the frank and for all fees and charges due the Postal Service in connection therewith."

In other words, if we only appropriate a given number of dollars but we mail much more than that, the Postal Service has to eat the difference.

Maybe we come up in a supplemental appropriation and pay for it. Maybe we do not. But if we do not, the law says the Postal Service has to take all the money that we have appropriated as payment in full.

That is not right. That is telling the Postal Service that they have to, basically, lose, or eat, anything that we underappropriate. That is not the way it should be.

I will work with the Senator——

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NICKLES. I will work with the Senator, the chairman of the Rules Committee, to try to change that. But that is present law.

I stated on this floor in the past that we should change that. We should not be able to mail any more than what we appropriate funds for. If we agree to the resolution as now before us, we will be repealing Senate Resolution 458, which does place limitations on Senate mail.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. NICKLES. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has only 12 seconds left.

Mr. NICKLES. I will give the Senator 12 seconds.

Mr. FORD. What you stated about the statute is correct. But the practices has been to enact supplemental appropriations.

I think it will be very little trouble to have that done since the practice has been the supplemental.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time yielded by the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. NICKLES. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me just a moment on his time?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. NICKLES. I happen to be on the Legislative Branch Appropriations Committee, and I will work with the Senator in the future. If we open this up for 6 frank postal patron mailings and an unlimited amount of response type mailings a supplemental request could be enormous. I would have some responsibility bringing that to the floor. I do not want to do that. I do not want to see mail costs in the Senate grow from $30 to $80 or $100 million. I think this is what could happen, unless we change the resolution.

Mr. FORD. Since the Senator is on my time, let me just try to reason with him, if I can. Right now, in the first quarter, the House has spent almost $8 million, and we barely spent $2 million. It all comes out of the same appropriated figure. So we are very frugal; we do not spend it and they continue to spend it.

Under the present circumstances, we are hindering those who would like to mail newsletters. We are not giving them the opportunity to do it. We restrict them while the House continues to do that.

Why not give your colleagues a level playing field so that they may have the same opportunities? And then we can repeal whatever we want to do, make the changes. But the precedent has been supplemental.

You can have all kinds of charts and that sort of thing that you want out of here. I think I understand. We go by supplemental, not by the rules that you stated a while ago. However, that is proper. You read it properly, and I have no quarrel with that, but precedent is one thing around this body that we follow.

Mr. President, how much time is left by the Senator from California and the Senator from Kentucky?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). The Senator from California has 7 minutes and 57 seconds remaining. The Senator from Kentucky has 22 minutes.

Mr. FORD. I am willing to yield back my time. You have had all but 7 minutes. I have maybe just used 6 minutes. If the Senator from California will think about yielding back the time, I will move to table, get the yeas and nays and set it aside until our colleagues are back from the White House. Would he agree to that?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell my friend from Kentucky I do not intend to use all of the time. I will use some of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am not going to use all the time that remains. There is a fairly simple issue before us. The taxpayers are paying for congressional newsletters from which they receive precious little benefit. It is costing them money, money that could be spent for other far more meritorious purposes. We are elected to set and keep priorities. I submit that congressional newsletters are not an urgent public priority, not in a time when we are pressing for ways to reduce the deficit. In fact, not at any time, in my judgment.

But to give some idea of what it has cost the taxpayers, I ask my colleagues to look at this chart. It is a very simple chart. This bar graph here indicates the costs to the taxpayers in millions of dollars, what it has cost them to pay for the Senate franking privilege. In 1983, it cost them $32 million. In 1984, $44 million; in 1985, it cost them $40 million. In 1986, it cost them $36 million. In 1987, it cost them $19 million. In 1988, it cost them $36 million.

But if we agree to this resolution and do not defeat it, do not strike it by the amendment that I have offered with Senator NICKLES, it gives promise of costing the taxpayers $160 million—that is the red bar here—just for the postal patron mailings. And when you add what can be expected in the way of address mailings on top of it, and town notices, that figure can climb easily to $180 million—$180 million—not for an urgent public priority.

Let me just respond to a couple of points made by my friend from Kentucky. He is expressing great frustration that we will not save money by not spending it because our share will be spent by the House of Representatives. I will accord him this much: The House of Representatives' behavior in this regard has been disgraceful. What he is saying is because they have been guilty of this kind of profligate conduct, we should be getting our share. It is not like saying we ought to stop the process; we ought to be getting our share.

I suggest that what we ought to be doing is stopping the process, and he is quite correct, this will not stop the House, not immediately. But I think if they begin to hear from their constituents that they only are doing this profligate thing with the taxpayers' dollars that there will be the kind of unhappiness that we saw manifested on something of far mor modest cost in terms of a 50-percent congressional pay raise.

This is a 500-percent increase, and the fact of the matter is, yes, there is only $50 milllion appropriated. Every time we spend more, and my friend from Kentucky has said here today that we do keep overspending that amount, what do we do? We get a supplemental appropriation. Either that or the Post Office would have to eat it. Well, they do eat it for a few months until we get them that supplemental appropriation.

Let us not delude anyone. This is costing taxpayers money, and a lot of it, but from $36 to $180 million I think is an unsupportable leap. The adoption of this amendment will simply keep us at the status quo. It will not allow the 6 postal patron mailings.

Mr. President, the issue is a simple one. What is an urgent public priority for the reelection of Senators, including many who have opposed public financing of campaigns, is not an urgent public priority for the taxpayers. We should not be wasting their money in this unjustifiable way. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on my motion to table the Wilson amendment occur immediately following the using or yielding back of the time on the Helms amendment and that the vote on or in relation to the Helms amendment occur immediately following the disposition of the Wilson amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HELMS. Reserving the right to object, I am sorry, I did not hear the request.

Mr. FORD. I asked unanimous consent that the vote on my motion to table Senator WILSON's amendment, when the time is yielded back or all time used, occur immediately following the disposition of the Helms amendment. We want to stack the votes because we have some people downtown.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator, Mr. President, and I have no objection.

Mr. NICKLES. Did we get the yeas and nays?

Mr. FORD. Not yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, it is very difficult to make people understand that we are trying to cut back. Under the present circumstances, we continue to grow and grow and grow, and it is grossly unfair to the Senate under the circumstances. I know this is going to look good back in California in the governor's race. I have been governor and I understand it. We are saving money. We want to be frugal. I have gone through all of this.

But, Mr. President, fair is fair. I intend to see that my colleagues are represented fairly. I think it is fair that we play by the same rules as the House, that we put the spotlight on them, we divide it and ask them to go ahead and try to stay under as we have. We save it and they spend it; they spend more than that.

We will never reach the maximum because the distinguished Senator from California does not send out any newsletters. If he does not send out any newsletters, he does not spend any money. So if he does not spend any money, you will never reach the maximum. I do not send out newsletters. I have sent out one in the last 2 or 3 years. So it cannot ever reach the maximum because I am not sending them out. So we will never reach the maximum. We can restrain ourselves.

Mr. President, it is a matter of fairness. Once we have this in place, we are on a level playing field and then we can seek separate appropriations for the House and Senate. Let the House do what they want. Let us limit ourselves. Let us do it to ourselves rather than to have to pay and pay and pay and not get any of the results.

Mr. President, I move to table the amendment of the Senator from California and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORD. Under the previous unanimous-consent agreement, this will be set aside and we will now go to Senator HELMS, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The Senator from North Carolina.

AMENDMENT NO. 8

(Purpose: To reduce funding increases for Senate committees)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the chair. I thank my good friend from Kentucky, Mr. FORD.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS for himself, Mr. NICKLES, and Mr. WILSON] proposes an amendment numbered 8.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. NICKLES] be added as a cosponsor, and the distinguished Senator from California, Mr. WILSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Now, then, Mr. President, the pending resolution (S. Res. 66) is the 2-year committee funding resolution, and it is structured so that each committee will on average receive an increase in recurring funds of approximately 10.7 percent in 1989 and an additional 2 percent in 1990.

The 10.7-increase assumes a 4.1-percent cost-of-living increase for 1989 and a 2-percent cost-of-living increase for 1990. Under the 2-year budget process, which is new, committees will be allowed to carry over into 1990 any unexpended funds remaining from this year.

Mr. President, I am offering the amendment to reduce the level of recurring funds provided in Senate Resolution 66 from an average of 10.7 percent and 2 percent to an average of 5.3 and 2 percent for committee years 1989 and 1990, respectively.

At this point I ask unanimous consent that a table comparing the proposed funding levels for each committee under Senate Resolution 66 and under my amendment be printed in the RECORD. at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HELMS. Now, why am I doing this, Mr. President? I am doing it because somewhere, sometime there ought to be some signal from the Congress of the United States that we are willing to tighten our belts and not spend as much money as we might like to spend.

I know the argument will be made that we have already cut back, but if the Federal Government were a private business it would be under Chapter 11 right now. The difference between the Federal Government and private enterprise is that private enterprise cannot print money.

So I think we ought to send a signal to the American people. It is not going to hurt any committee to have this amendment added to Senate Resolution 66. Let me give you an example, Mr. President. The Agriculture Committee will have a balance of about $150,000 which is going to carry over from last year. That will be in addition to the 10.7 percent and 2 percent increases provided by the resolution. The Appropriations Committee will have $170,000 to carry over, Armed Services will have $175,000 to carry over, and so forth.

Mr. President, any committee chairman, ranking member or staff director who cannot save $150,000 in a committee or, in the case of the Intelligence Committee, $110,000, or in the case of the Finance Committee, $88,500, ought to take a lesson in how to economize a little bit. Because, Mr. President, when one subtracts the assumed 4.1-percent cost of living increase from the average 10.7-percent increase in recurring funds provided for this year, it becomes evident that we are providing our committees with real growth of more than 6 percent over the next 2 years.

But that estimate does not even take into account the unexpended balances from the 100th Congress that committees, as I said, will be allowed to carry over into this year under the resolution.

The total estimated unexpended balance that will be carried over from the 100th Congress to this Congress, which of course is the 101st Congress, is $2,145,210, that is 4.5 percent of the 1988 committee budget. When you add the total unspent balance to the increase provided in S. Res. 66, you come up with an increase of more than 15 percent.

I ask unanimous consent that a table setting forth the estimated unspent balances for each committee be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. HELMS. Let me emphasize one thing, Mr. President. I appreciate the fine job that the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. FORD, and the distinguished ranking member, Mr. STEVENS, have done with what is probably one of the most unenviable jobs in the Senate. However, it apparently has been determined that our committee structure is too small and it must grow.

That impresses me as a significant policy decision, one that deserves some discussion and consideration by the Senate.

Under the pending amendment, the reduced increases would be allocated among committees in proportion to the levels now provided in Senate Resolution 66, with one exception. The leadership of the Committee on Small Business is to be commended for holding their requested increase to 4.15 percent for 1989. The Committee on Small Business was the only committee to request less than a 5-percent increase for this year. All other requests range from 9 percent to more than 51 percent. Consequently, under the amendment, no reduction will be made in the increase proposed for the Small Business Committee.

Let me point out, Mr. President, that the amendment would not affect the provision allowing committees to carry over unexpended funds. They can do that under the amendment, either from this session to the next, or from the 100th Congress. Allowing committees to carry forward unspent balances will serve to reward those committees who hold down or have held down their expenses in the prior funding period.

Also, lest there be some concern, my amendment would make no reduction in the nonrecurring funds provided by the resolution. For example, rather than providing the permanent 51-percent increase requested by the Banking Committee to help the committee address the difficult issues that will come up during the 101st Congress, the Rules Committee decided to give the Banking Committee a smaller permanent increase of 29 percent and provide the rest on a nonrecurring basis.

Under my amendment, the permanent increase for the Banking Committee would be reduced to 14.5 percent, but the nonrecurring funds would not be affected.

As I said at the outset, I believe Congress should at least send a signal, however small, to the American people that we are willing to tighten our belts. We should continue to hold the line on the size of the committees and the cost of operating the committees.

Back in the 1970's, I might point out, Mr. President, the size of congressional staffs grew significantly. From 1967 to 1977, the total number of legislative branch employees increased from 27,545 to 39,978. But I am delighted to note that during the 1980's, we've managed to restrain that growth, as we should have done. We should have done it earlier. But I was not here. Senator FORD was not here. And spending was not restrained. In fact, nowhere in the Federal Government was spending restrained. That is the cause of the budget problem in the country today.

I think it is unwise to reverse that trend of restraint that we exercised in the 1980's—especially when we are now trying to constrain the growth in all other aspects of the Federal Government.

The pending amendment would make only a modest reduction in dollars in the growth of our committees. Total savings over 2 years would be $5 million. Senators may say, "Well, that is not much." And, of course, it is not in terms of the total cost of operating the Congress of the United States, let alone the total operating cost of the Federal Government. It is $5 million. It sends a signal, however, that we want to do at least something, and this would be it. But the point is that even if my amendment is passed, we will be allowing the committees of the U.S. Senate some real growth over the next 2 years. While I do not think our committees need any real growth, I am convinced that the pending amendment offers a reasonable compromise to the levels proposed in Senate Resolution 66.

Mr. President, it is not my intent and not my wish to single out any particular committee with this amendment. All committee chairmen and ranking minority members, including myself, testified before the Rules Committee requesting on average a 10-percent increase for our respective committees for this year. I am sure that each chairman and each ranking member sincerely believes that his or her committee deserves an increase. Because the Foreign Relations Committee ranks at the top of the productivity rating, I agreed with Senator PELL, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that the committee is worthy of an increase if—and I underscore the word "if"—the overall levels are going to be increased. Maybe that was a copout. I did not intend it to be so. But I stressed to Senator PELL that I retained my option to try to reduce the overall increases for committees, including the Foreign Relations Committee.

I am offering the amendment in the hopes that all of our colleagues, whether or not they are committee chairmen or ranking members, will agree that we need to continue to hold the line on our budgets. I believe that every Senator should be concerned about the message, the signal, we will be sending to the American people if we increase our committee budgets by approximately 15 percent when we are asking the American people to tighten their belts and do without an increase.

UNEXPENDED BALANCES

S. Res. 66 allows Committee to establish a Special Reserve for the unexpended balances from the current Committee Year, which ends 28 Feb. 89. The Special Reserve may be used in the next Committee year. Committees are also allowed to carry over any unexpended funds into the 1990 Committee year. Committees estimated the following unexpended balances for the Committee year ending today:

Committee	Balance
Agriculture	$150,000
Appropriations	170,000
Armed Services	175,993
Banking	848
Budget	13,261
Commerce	220,444

[1] No changes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I appreciate the kind words that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina made toward me and to my distinguished friend and ranking member, Senator STEVENS from Alaska, regarding our diligence.

Mr. President, we listened to every chairman. We listened to every ranking member. And I do not recall any member, chairman or ranking member, that objected to their budget for the next 2 years. Now we find men who were there before the Rules Committee seeking these funds, now coming and objecting to what we are doing. It is a little bit disheartening, and a little bit disconcerting having gone through many hours with various committees developing a budget authorization which we believe is justified. The guidelines were, with justification, 10 percent in 1989 and 2 percent in 1990 for staff salaries. With few exceptions these guidelines were followed and are reflected in Senate Resolution 66.

The amendment under consideration would reduce the increase in the first year from 10 to 5 except for the Small Business Committee. The amendment is simple but its consequences are rather substantial.

For the Senate to perform effectively, committees need highly qualified staffs. I do not think there is any question about that. But what we are looking at here is a reduction in our ability to pay staff. It is a reduction of our ability to perform the job that is required of us and to be able to have staffs that work hard, are smart, and are paid reasonably well.

For the Senate to perform effectively, it needs highly qualified staff members.

Let me say this, Mr. President. No real growth was authorized in the last two budgets, in 1987 and 1988; both of them were zero, real growth. The committee chairman and ranking member struggled for 2 years under those budgets.

Now, Mr. President, we are looking at a biennial budget, and we say to the chairman in the guidelines, 10 percent the first year, 2 percent the second year, and with the carryover of surplus funds.

Senate Resolution 66 authorizes real growth of less than 3 percent each year, and some of this increase will be required to cover inflationary increases in administrative costs. If you try to just keep the same material that is necessary, the cost has gone up. I do not believe you ought to take it out of the hide of the staff. I do not believe that we are asking to give the committees too much.

This body should recognize that committees, their chairmen, and their ranking members are frugal. Our experiernce has been, in the years and I have been on the Rules Committee, that if the funds are not needed, they are not spent.

One argument proposed is to use these surplus funds to make up for the 5-percent cut. In my opinion, two overriding reasons exist to oppose this argument: First, the amount of surplus varies by committees. Thus, committees would not be treated uniformly. There is nothing fair about that. Also, several committees, such as Aging, Veterans' Affairs, and Indian Affairs, historically have had little surplus. They budget pretty tightly. If you take 5 percent away from them, they are going to be in a world of hurt.

Second, committees would be given an incentive to spend all funds authorized so that there would not be any surplus. I can go down the list and state where most of the surplus is. It is turnover of staff, generally, at the highest level. When staff leaves, it takes a while to replace them, and while you are waiting to replace them or find adequate staff replacement, you are not spending that money, and it shows up at the end of the year as surplus.

It is not all spent. You do not use carry over for recurring costs. We now hold that surplus for 2 fiscal years, but it covers costs of prior funded years expenses incurred. It is unexpended bills that come through, not salaries. The reserve in this authorization provides a transition into the biennial budget and will not be repeated between Congresses. We found that very little of the surplus has been used in the past; and so, under the circumstances, all that money each year drops off and goes back to the Treasury fund.

The important fact is that this resolution is not an increase in legislative appropriations for the Senate. It is an authorization to spend existing, available, appropriated funds. We are not asking for a supplemental. We are just asking for the authorization, under this resolution, to spend the funds that have already been appropriated. I believe the various committees have given ample justification to support the funding level incorporated in Senate Resolution 66. I urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment.

I was pleased that the Senator from North Carolina thought we had finally arrived at a way to help committees that have exceptional workloads. We thought about having a pool of money set aside, so that when a committee like the Banking Committee has an unusual burden, they would be able to have the money to hire employees. They know now what they have. They know how many people they need, and we funded them on a nonrecurring basis. At the end of this 2-year cycle, that is the end of it. We did the Indian Affairs Committee, Subcommittee on Special Investigation, the same way. We sunsetted it 1 year out on a nonrecurring basis. We have tried and we will keep plodding. We will keep moving. We will keep trying.

I have never seen any way to satisfy everyone. I have never seen a way to operate this place like a business. It is not intended to be operated like a business. We can operate it with business-like practices, and that is what we have tried to do in this resolution that we brought to the Senate floor.

The Senator from North Carolina is on the Rules Committee. He knows we ask each committee chairman and ranking member to give us the information as it relates to legislation, workload, hours spent, hours for staff employees, so that we can begin to justify the amount of money that is requested. In the next 2 years we will begin zero budgeting. That means we are going to start from the beginning with every committee and have them substantiate their need. All I ask is a chance to try a biennial budget. We are giving an authorization for the next 2 years. We do not expect a supplemental, and I will not be for one in the next 2 years—in order to try to bring this into focus and begin to operate it in the best way possible.

It is the same with respect to the amendment of the Senator from California. We are on the right track, but if you would listen to the condemnation of the procedure we are trying to move, you would think we are trying to raid the Treasury. We are not. We do not intend to. We intend to straighten it out, but we have to have a chance to prove ourselves. If we do not have a chance to prove ourselves, we will never know, and you will never know if we are right or wrong.

I joined the junior chamber of commerce when I was a young lad and enjoyed it. They give you a job, and if you failed, you were not fired, because you were head of a committee trying to do something to improve your community. Here, if we do not do a good job, we can be fired by the people back home. So I am not ashamed of what I am trying to do here. In fact, I am right proud of the committee. I think we have worked hard, and we have come up with a good way to make it work.

So, Mr. President, at some point I will move to table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

I understand that the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE] would like some time.

Mr. RIEGLE. I would like 2 or 3 minutes, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. FORD. I yield 3 minutes of my time to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator. I rise in support of the chairman, and I also rise in opposition to the Helms amendment.

I am here as one committee chairman representing one of the entire list of the committees that would be covered by this amendment. A request was made by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, to try to meet some extraordinary needs we are facing with the savings and loan problem particularly, a very major problem across the country, and a great concern in my State and all States, and certainly in the State of North Carolina. The ranking Republican member, Senator GARN, and I have asked for the staff resources that we think at a minimum we need to have to handle the work load that is before that committee. I mentioned the savings and loan crisis because that is such a clear and present overriding problem, where $100 billion has disappeared.

We need to reform the savings and loan system. We need to figure out a way to solve that problem and prevent it from happening again. But that is just one of many.

We are facing the financial services modernization issue. We are facing the issue of the Third World debt question. We are facing the issue of leveraged buyouts and tender offer regulation issues. We are still in the aftermath of the stock market crash. And the list goes on. That only just deals with the financial side of the committee.

Just one illustration: Every committee has its own story to tell, but I would just say to my colleagues and to the sponsor of the amendment if we do not have the people we need to do this job properly, big mistakes can happen. No matter how good the intentions are, and I would say that looking in the past, we have not in every case perhaps been as able to exercise our oversight responsibilities as we needed to be.

The savings and loan crisis I think is a classic illustration. One hundred billion dollars have disappeared. Now the American public is being asked to in effect restore the bulk of that money, and I must just say to you that just a day ago when we had one of the major ones before us, Alan Greenspan, who was in testifying in behalf of the savings and loan plan that the administration has brought forward which I have introduced by request along with Senator GARN, said to us in that session, "Look, this problem is so urgent and so large," paraphrasing, but the essence of his testimony was in part get this thing enacted right away; there will need almost certainly to be a midcourse correction somewhere down the line in a few months or a year or so, and we can make the midcourse correction at that time. That suggests that in that area alone our job is not just to try to sort through that issue now and come up with the best possible reform package and the best possible financing package and keep the cost to taxpayers as low as possible, when we finish with that we are not finished with the problem, we are going to have to monitor very carefully over the period of months to see if something that has been put together in a very hurried fashion is going to be really able to get the job done the way everyone hopes from the President on down. That involves the need on our part to really have some qualified and competent staff people at work to carry out that very specific oversight responsibility.

I only cite that example, but $100 billion even to the U.S. Senate is a lot of money. That is what disappeared out of the savings and loan system to the astonishment of many.

These are the reasons that I think having a limited number of qualified professional staff people is absolutely critical to us to be able to carry out our responsibility to craft this legislation properly and to see that it works the way it was intended.

I just make one other point about it. We have just gotten the President's package on the savings and loan legislation. It runs 333 pages. That is 333 pages where every line constitutes a change in the written law, every line on 333 pages. If a half sentence is wrong, it could end up causing the whole plan not to work properly.

So we have to go through that and as carefully as we can to try to make sure that there are not those kinds of inadvertent errors or advertent errors of judgment in this thing and try to make sure it is going to work right.

I want to say as one new chairman, and I am not different from any other chairman in this sense, new or old, I want to do a good job. I want to really bring something in here that I can present to the Senator from Alaska, the Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from North Carolina that I am confident is as close as we can get to a good solid timely answer. That is why we need the help. There is no other reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. FORD. I yield 3 minutes to my friend from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think I will use that fully.

But working with the Senator from Kentucky on the Rules Committee is an enlightening and rewarding experience. We are pursuing ways to save the taxpayers money.

Let me take just for instance the postal patron mailing. That was a charge we made a number of years ago.

Mr. President, if you send out a postal patron mailing, you do not have to address it. You do not have to use zip codes. You just send to each zip code the number of pieces of mail there are patrons in that area. They do not have to have separate staff to sort them in the post offices by number or by zip code thus the cost of postage is less.

It is the most efficient way to handle mail, because you do not have to have a computer list, computers, all the handling. It costs less for the taxpayers, but it looks like we might spend more if everybody mailed everything they are entitled to mail. Allowing the use of postal patron mail helped us save money by providing a cheaper method of mailing that each Member may use.

We know from history everyone in the Senate does not mail everything they are entitled to mail. As a matter of fact, I think Senators are becoming more conservative in their approach to mailing. We all are, and we are trying to reduce the cost of the Senate.

Similarly in regard to the amendment of my good friend from North Carolina, this resolution is merely an authorization to committees to spend. We have an incentive not to spend because if they do not spend it they can carry it over for a later year when they might run into the kind of emergency that the Banking Committee has this year and we have to make a special allocation to him.

Through frugal application of the authorities under this resolution, we can run the Senate better for less money if the Senate will do it.

This is a very good approach to the management of the Senate. Nothing says you have to spend this money. Furthermore, it is a contingent upon us in the appropriations process to provide the money that is necessary because this is a 2-year resolution that is before us.

So, the Senate will have a chance to revisit this in terms of the appropriations for the next year. But right now, I think this is the best way to do business and to call on every Member of the Senate to think twice before they mail, to think twice before they decide to hire a new staff member on a committee, and the cost will come down because the flexibility for good management is in this resolution.

Thank you very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time.

Mr. FORD. I yield 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, adoption of the amendment that has been offered by my good friend, Mr. HELMS, would reduce the Appropriations Committee's fiscal year 1989 funding to a level that is $32,189 below our current annualized spending rate.

Our expenses other than salaries were not increased for either fiscal year 1989 or 1990.

Adoption of the Helms amendment might well force the Committee on Appropriations to reduce staffing.

There may be some people who would say, "Well, that is fine, that is what we ought to do around here; we ought to reduce the staffing."

The Appropriations Committee staff levels have held steady for a good many years. Today we have 82 positions in the Senate Appropriations Committee. In fiscal year 1980 we had 84 positions in the Appropriations Committee. So that number has not fluctuated much over these intervening years. I think that is a good record.

In fiscal year 1980, the Appropriations Committee had 84 positions; fiscal year 1981, 79 positions; fiscal year 1982, 79 positions; fiscal year 1983, 82 positions; fiscal year 1984, 82 positions; fiscal year 1985, 82 positions; fiscal year 1986, 82 positions; fiscal year 1987, 81 positions; fiscal year 1988, 78 positions; and fiscal year 1989, 82 positions.

So, after 10 years the Appropriations Committee today has two positions less than it had 10 years ago. That is, I think a rather interesting comment on the Appropriations Committee.

Here we have a committee that passes on billions and billions of dollars. We have a budget this year of $1.3 trillion.

Now, while the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has held steadily to about the same number over these 10 years, look at the explosion in the executive departments. Each of the executive departments comes up here annually with requests; they want 50 new positions, they want 100 new positions, they want 500 new positions, they want 600 new positions. If they ask for 600 new positions we may give them 400. They will be back next year, and they may ask for 500 more or whatever, and we may give them 400 again.

And so there has been a virtual explosion of positions in the executive department. How are we able to contend with that kind of manpower in the executive branch, a virtual army when it comes to the executive department? They may not get every position they want but they are constantly getting an increased number of positions.

Just 50 years ago, Congress created the Executive Office of the President permitting FDR to hire a half-dozen special assistants, rather than rely exclusively on the various Cabinet Departments of the Government for that assistance. Now look at the size of the President's staff. They fill the entire Old Executive Office Building, which, in FDR's time, housed the Department of State, the Department of War, and the Department of the Navy. That is the way the executive departments are growing, hand over fist, and we continue to give them more and more and more positions, whether it is a Democratic administration or a Republican administration.

The same new demands on the Government, both nationally and internationally, that required an increase in executive staff, have required expansion of the legislative staff. We have four positions more than we had last year on appropriations, but we have two less than we had 10 years ago. And the Appropriations Committee is the salt mine of the Senate—the salt mine. So we need these positions, in the interest of the taxpayers, so that we might look at all the appropriations requests that come through that committee from the President and the Departments. We need experienced, capable, knowledgeable staff people on the Appropriations Committee to screen the Federal budget and to guide us as we make our judgments concerning the funding requests that come from the executive department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The time yielded to the senior Senator from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. FORD. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. So I say to my colleagues, I hope that we will not support this penny-wise, pound-foolish effort. And I do not say this to cast any aspersions on the Senator from North Carolina. He is doing what he believes is right. I respect him for that.

But I call attention to what we are doing to the legislative branch if amendments like this are agreed to, while we continue to let the executive branch go whole hog, all out for positions and we approve many of them. We put the moneys in so they can snow us in the executive branch while we try with a small number to cope with the army of experts from the Agriculture Department, the State Department, the Defense Department and the other Departments.

I hope that my colleagues will give a resoundingly strong vote in tabling the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, let me say to my good friend from West Virginia, the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, that I will stand arm and arm with him to cut down that phalanx of employees downtown. This amendment will give us a leg to stand on, to say, "We have cut ourselves, and let us cut you appropriately." And I stand with him, and I will help him any way I can.

There is nothing in this amendment, of course, as the distinguished Senator knows, that validates the horde of employees in the executive branch and in the Executive Office Building. He is right. That is the point I am making.

Now, as for the Appropriations Committee, I am not sure where the Senator got his figures, but if he is right, then the committee report is wrong and my figures are wrong. What my amendment proposes is a 7.48-percent increase for the Appropriations Committee, plus a carryover of $170,000 from last year.

Now, that is not cutting anybody. That is not limiting anybody.

As for the Banking Committee, let me tell my friend from West Virginia an amusing little thing. I had a call from a banker in North Carolina. He said, "I got a call from the Senate Banking Committee and they said that you are about to gut their whole process for the funds proposed for the Banking Committee." I said, "Well, not quite." And I pointed out to him, I said, "We recognize the need for adequate pay for staff." The amendment allows an overall 5-percent increase for all committees. That includes the 4.1-percent COLA. Now, that is what the staff member of the Banking Committee is worried about, his own little hip pocket. And, of course, we all are.

But the point is, Mr. President, that the Banking Committee still gets a total of a 37-percent increase under my amendment—37 percent. And this I related to the banker who had called me after he had received a call from a staff member in the Banking Committee. Let me emphasize that the amendment does not cut the nonrecurring funds for the Banking Committee, nor for any other committee, for that matter.

Now it is a simple matter of whether we are going to lay the predicate right there today to say to the administration: "You have got to cut out hiring everybody in sight."

I will tell you something else that bothers me, and I say this to my friend from West Virginia. How many times have I brought in staff members, trained them and worked with them and the first thing I know they come to me and say, "Senator, I have an offer downtown. They are going to pay me $32,000 a year more than you are paying me." And I say, "Well, fine. You have to make a decision about that."

So I agree with the Senator from West Virginia. I am so glad that he is going to be in charge of the Appropriations Committee. I do not say this disparagingly of anybody who has headed it in the past, because they have all been fine Senators and fine chairmen. But I believe that Senator ROBERT C. BYRD is going to get out a sharp pencil and he is going to look at all of these employees. He is going to look at the money that is being paid to them over and above what most Senators pay for the same type of personnel.

I think we ought to get started this afternoon by sending a message to the taxpayers of the United States of America that we are willing to cut, albeit very little, the increase in the proposed spending for our committees. That is all the amendment does. It is going to cut out half of the projected increase under Senate Resolution 66. And I think that is a fair proposition if we really mean all of this breast-beating that we do when we go home—and every Senator does it—"I'm for a balanced budget and I am going to vote to limit Federal spending." Well, there are a lot of other things besides charity that begin at home. I think we ought to begin right here and send the right message to the American people, and then I will stand arm and arm with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

How much time remains, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 12 minutes and 3 seconds.

Mr. HELMS. I yield back my time.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I am ready to yield back the remainder of my time. If the Senator will allow me, then? I move to table the amendment by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second on the motion to table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORD. Point of information, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of information.

Mr. FORD. Would the Presiding Officer reiterate the unanimous-consent agreement we have as it relates to these two votes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the motion to table the amendment by the Senator from California will be taken up first.

Mr. FORD. These are 15-minute votes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In accordance with the standing order.

Mr. FORD. Then, immediately following the tabling motion on the amendment by the Senator from California, the motion by the Senator from North Carolina will be voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

VOTE ON AMENDMENT NO. 7

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment by the Senator from California.

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI] is absent because of illness.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 47, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 14 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—2

Jeffords	Mikulski

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today as the chairman of the Committee on the Budget in support of Senate Resolution 66, the committee funding resolution, one part of which is the funding authorization for the Committee on the Budget. I also want to voice my opposition to the Helms amendment that would effectively cut the increases in those committee budgets in half.

As for almost all of the committee funding requests, the Budget Committee's request calls for a 10-percent salary increase so that the committee may continue to recruit and retain top-notch, experienced staff for the difficult and challenging work that lies ahead of it in the budget process. This request is within the guidelines that the Rules Committee recommended.

It's worth noting that, after allowing for the 4.1-percent cost-of-living adjustment that went into effect January 1, 1989, the increase requested results in a true increase of only 5.9 percent.

It's also worth noting that this increase is for the first year of a 2-year budget. The second year has built into it only a 2-percent cost-of-living increase.

Government service is a privilege of which we are all proud. But especially in areas requiring technical expertise, it is difficult to compete with the much higher salaries in the private sector. After just a few years in Government service, many seasoned and experienced staff members go to work in the private sector in order to be able to pay their mortgages and send their children to college. Retaining experienced staff with proven expertise in budget matters is key, and this request is necessary to get the flexibility to hire and hold the best possible people.

Our Budget Committee staff provides valuable technical assistance and advice not only to Budget Committee members, but to all of our Senate Members. We want to continue to provide and enhance that support service.

In closing, I want to commend the work of the Rules Committee, its chairman, Senator FORD, and its ranking member, Senator STEVENS. They have performed the difficult and often thankless task of keeping a lid on the budget. Believe me, as chairman of the Budget Committee, I know what sort of pressures they had to deal with. They deserve our support, as does the committee funding resolution that they have brought before us today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the floor managers desire to yield back their time on the resolution?

Mr. FORD. I yield back my time, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That this resolution may be cited as the "Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution for 1989 and 1990".

AGGREGATE AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 2. (a) In carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under the Standing Rules of the Senate, and under the appropriate authorizing resolutions of the Senate, there is authorized for the period March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, in the aggregate of $53,252,088, and for the period March 1, 1990 through February 28, 1991, in the aggregate of $53,430,099 in accordance with the provisions of this resolution, for all Standing Committees of the Senate, the Special Committee on Aging, the Select Committee on Intelligence, and the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

(b) Each committee referred to in subsection (a) shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1990, and February 28, 1991, respectively.

(c) Any expenses of a committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required (1) for the disbursement of salaries of employees of the committee who are paid at an annual rate, or (2) for the payment of telecommunications expenses provided by the Office of the Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate, Department of Telecommunications, or (3) for the payments to the Keeper of Stationery, United States Senate.

(d) There are authorized such sums as may be necessary for agency contributions related to the compensation of employees of the committees from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, to be paid from the appropriations account for "Expenses of Inquiries and Investigations.".

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

SEC. 3. (a) In carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under the Standing Rules of the Senate, in accordance with its jurisdiction under rule XXV of such rules, including holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by paragraphs 1 and 8 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, in its discretion (1) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (2) to employ personnel, and (3) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable, or non-reimbursable, basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(b) The expenses of the committee for the period March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, under this section shall not exceed $1,876,650, of which amount (1) not to exceed $4,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended), and (2) not to exceed $4,000 may be expended for the training of the professional staff of such committee (under procedures specified by section 202(j) of such Act).

(c) For the period March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, expenses of the committee under this section shall not exceed $1,914,132, of which amount (1) not to exceed $4,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended), and (2) not to exceed $4,000 may be expended for the training of the professional staff of such committee (under procedures specified by section 202(j) of such Act).

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) In carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under Standing Rules of the Senate, in accordance with its jurisdiction under rule XXV of such rules, including holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by paragraph 1 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, in its discretion (1) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (2) to employ personnel, and (3) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable, or nonreimbursable, basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(b) The expenses of the committee for the period March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, under this section shall not exceed $4,736,267, of which amount (1) not to exceed $160,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended), and (2) not to exceed $8,000 may be expended for the training of the professional staff of such committee (under procedures specified by section 202(j) of such Act).

(d)(1) The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to study or investigate—

(A) the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches of the Government including the possible existence of fraud, misfeasance, malfeasance, collusion, mismanagement, incompetence, corruption, or unethical practices, waste, extravagance, conflicts of interest, and the improper expenditures of Government funds in transactions, contracts, and activities of the Government or of Government officials and employees and any and all such improper practices between Government personnel and corporations, individuals, companies, or persons affiliated therewith, doing business with the Government; and the compliance or noncompliance of such corporations, companies, or individuals or other entities with the rules, regulations, and laws governing the various governmental agencies and its relationships with the public;

(B) the extent to which criminal or other improper practices or activities are, or have been, engaged in the field of labor-management relations or in groups or organizations of employees or employers, to the detriment of interests of the public, employers, or employees, and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect such interests against the occurrence of such practices or activities;

(C) organized criminal activity which may operate in or otherwise utilize the facilities of interstate or international commerce in furtherance of any transactions and the manner and extent to which, and the identity of the persons, firms, or corporations, or other entities by whom such utilization is being made, and further, to study and investigate the manner in which and the extent to which persons engaged in organized criminal activity have infiltrated lawful business enterprise, and to study the adequacy of Federal laws to prevent the operations of organized crime in interstate or international commerce; and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect the public against such practices or activities;

(D) all other aspects of crime and lawlessness within the United States which have an impact upon or affect the national health, welfare, and safety; including but not limited to investment fraud schemes, commodity and security fraud, computer fraud, and the use of offshore banking and corporate facilities to carry out criminal objectives;

(E) the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches and functions of the Government with particular reference to—

(i) the effectiveness of present national security methods, staffing, and processes as tested against the requirements imposed by the rapidly mounting complexity of national security problems;

(ii) the capacity of present national security staffing, methods, and processes to make full use of the Nation's resources of knowledge, talents;

(iii) the adequacy of present intergovernmental relations between the United States and international organizations principally concerned with national security of which the United States is a member; and

(iv) legislative and other proposals to improve these methods, processes, and relationships;

(F) the efficiency, economy, and effectiveness of all agencies and departments of the Government involved in the control and management of energy shortages including, but not limited to, their performance with respect to—

(i) the collection and dissemination of accurate statistics on fuel demand and supply;

(ii) the implementation of effective energy conservation measures;

(iii) the pricing of energy in all forms;

(iv) coordination of energy programs with State and local government;

(v) control of exports of scarce fuels;

(vi) the management of tax, import, pricing, and other policies affecting energy supplies;

(vii) maintenance of the independent sector of the petroleum industry as a strong competitive force;

(viii) the allocation of fuels in short supply by public and private entities;

(ix) the management of energy supplies owned or controlled by the Government;

(x) relations with other oil producing and consuming countries;

(xi) the monitoring of compliance by governments, corporations, or individuals with the laws and regulations governing the allocation, conservation, or pricing of energy supplies; and

(xii) research into the discovery and development of alternative energy supplies; and

(G) the efficiency and economy of all branches and functions of Government with particular reference to the operations and management of Federal regulatory policies and programs:

Provided, That, in carrying out the duties herein set forth, the inquiries of this committee or any subcommittee thereof shall not be deemed limited to the records, functions, and operations of any particular branch of the Government; but may extend to the records and activities of any persons, corporation, or other entity.

(2) Nothing contained in this section shall affect or impair the exercise of any other standing committee of the Senate of any power, or the discharge by such committee of any duty, conferred or imposed upon it by the Standing Rules of the Senate or by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended.

(3) For the purpose of this section the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, or its chairman, or any other member of the committee or subcommittee designated by the chairman, from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, is authorized, in its, his, or their discretion (A) to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and production of correspondence, books, papers, and documents, (B) to hold hearings, (C) to sit and act at any time or place during the sessions, recess, and adjournment periods of the Senate, (D) to administer oaths, and (E) to take testimony, either orally or by sworn statement, or, in the case of staff members of the Committee and the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, by deposition in accordance with the Committee Rules of Procedure (4) All subpoenas and related legal processes of the committee and its subcommittees authorized under S. Res. 381 of the One Hundredth Congress, second session, are authorized to continue.

(c) For the period March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, expenses of the committee under this section shall not exceed $1,213,792, of which amount (1) not to exceed $33,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended), and (2) not to exceed $800 may be expended for the training of the professional staff of such committee (under procedures specified by section 202(j) of such Act).

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

SEC. 20. (a) In carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under S. Res. 400, agreed to May 19, 1976, in accordance with its jurisdiction under section 3(a) of such resolution, including holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by section 5 of such resolution, the Select Committee on Intelligence is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, in its discretion (1) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (2) to employ personnel, and (3) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable, or nonreimbursable, basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(b) The expenses of the committee for the period March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, under this section shall not exceed $2,305,816, of which amount not to exceed $30,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended).

(c) For the period March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, expenses of the committee under this section shall not exceed $2,353,721, of which amount not to exceed $30,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended).

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

SEC. 21. (a) In carrying out the duties and functions imposed by section 105 of S. Res. 4, Ninety-fifth Congress, agreed to February 4 (legislative day, February 1), 1977, as amended, the Select Committee on Indian Affairs is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, and March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, in its discretion (1) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (2) to employ personnel, and (3) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable, or nonreimbursable, basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(b) The expenses of the committee for the period March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, under this section shall not exceed $1,887,941, of which amount not to exceed $174,846 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended).

(c) For the period March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, expenses of the committee under this section shall not exceed $1,021,116, of which amount not to exceed $4,846 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended).

(d)(1) The Special Committee on Investigations (hereafter in this section referred to as the "special committee"), a duly authorized subcommittee of the select committee, is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, to study or investigate any and all matters pertaining to problems and opportunities of Indians and the Federal administration of mineral resources, including but not limited to State governments, Indian education, health, special services, and other Federal programs, and related matters.

(2) For the purpose of this section the special committee is authorized from March 1, 1989, through February 28, 1990, in its discretion (A) to adopt rules (not inconsistent with this resolution and the Standing Rules of the Senate) governing its procedure, to be published in the Congressional Record, (B) to make investigations into any matter within its jurisdiction, (C) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (D) to employ personnel, (E) to sit and act at any time or place during the sessions, recess, and adjourned periods of the Senate, (F) to hold hearings and to take staff depositions and other testimony, (G) to require, by subpoena or order, the attendance of witnesses and the production of correspondence, books, papers, and documents at hearings or at staff depositions, (H) to procure the services of individual consultants or organizations thereof, in accordance with the provisions of section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and (I) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable, or nonreimbursable basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(3) The chairman of the special committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses, and, at staff depositions authorized by the special committee, oaths may be administered by any individual authorized by local law to administer oaths.

(4) Subpoenas authorized by the special committee may be issued over the signature of the chairman, or any member of the special committee designated by the chairman or the member signing the subpoena.

(e) The special committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate through the select committee at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1990.

SPECIAL RESERVE

SEC. 22. Of the funds authorized for any Senate committee by Senate Resolution 381, agreed to February 26, 1988, for the funding period ending on the last day of February 1989, any unexpended balance remaining after such last day shall be transferred to a special reserve for such committee, which reserve shall be available to such committee for the period commencing March 1, 1989, and ending with the close of September 20, 1989, for the purpose of (1) meeting any unpaid obligations incurred during the funding period ending on the last day of February 1989, and (2) meeting expenses of such committee incurred after such last day and prior to the close of September 30, 1989.

SEC. 23. Of the funds authorized for any Senate committee by this resolution for the funding period ending on the last day of February 1990, any unexpended balance remaining after such last day shall be transferred to a special reserve for such committee, which reserve shall be available to such committee for the period commencing March 1, 1990, and ending the with close of September 30, 1990, for the purpose of (1) meeting any unpaid obligations incurred during the funding period ending on the last day of February 1990, and (2) meeting expenses of such committee incurred after such last day and prior to the close of September 30, 1990.

LIMITS ON FRANKED MAIL MAILED WITH A SIMPLIFIED FORM OF ADDRESS

SEC. 24. (a) S. Res. 458, agreed to September 9, 1988, is hereby repealed.

(b) The total number of pieces of mail which may be mailed as franked mail under section 3210(d) of title 39, United States Code, during any calendar year by a Senator entitled to mail franked mail may not exceed an amount equal to six multiplied by the number of addresses to which such mail may be delivered in the State from which the Senator was elected. Any mail matter which relates solely to a notice of appearance or a scheduled itinerary of a Senator or such Senator's personal staff representative in the State from which such Senator was elected shall not count against the limitation set forth in the preceding sentence.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING TESTIMONY OF EMPLOYEE OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the distinguished Republican leader, Mr. DOLE, I send to the desk a resolution, authorization for testimony by a present and a former employee of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 71) to authorize a present and a former employee of the Senate to testify in the case of United States v. Ladd Anthony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Department of Justice has requested that a present and a former employee of the Senate provide testimony in the case of United States versus Ladd Anthony, which is a criminal prosecution pending in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio. The prosecution arises from a referral to the Department of Justice by Senator METZENBAUM's office. This resolution authorizes one present and one former employee on Senator METZENBAUM's staff to provide testimony relevant to the trial of these charges in response to the Department's request. No matters of legislative privilege are involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 71

Whereas, in the case of United States v. Ladd Anthony, Cr. No. 88-271, pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, the Department of Justice has requested the testimony of Candy Korn, a present member, and Peter Harris, a former member, of Senator Metzenbaum's staff;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony or documents, papers, and records of the Senate may be needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Candy Korn and Peter Harris are authorized to testify in the case of United States v. Ladd Anthony.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I inquire of the acting Republican leader whether calendar items numbered 5 through 20 have been cleared on his side of the aisle.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, those items are cleared on this side of the aisle.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of calendar items 5 through 20 en bloc; that, as necessary, they be read for the third time and passed or agreed to; that the preambles, where indicated, be agreed to; and that the motions to reconsider on all votes be tabled en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF A SENATE REPORT

The resolution (S. Res. 53) authorizing printing additional copies of Senate report titled "Developments in Aging: 1988," was considered, and agreed to.

The resolution is as follows:

S. RES. 53

Resolved, That there shall be printed for the use of the Special Committee on Aging the maximum number of copies of volumes 1 and 2 of its annual report to the Senate, entitled "Developments in Aging: 1988", which may be printed at a cost not to exceed $1,200.

JEWISH HERITAGE WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 25) to designate the week of May 7, 1989, as "Jewish Heritage Week" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 25

Whereas May 10, 1989, marks the forty-first anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel;

Whereas the months of April, May, and June contain events of major significance in the Jewish calendar—Passover, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Holocaust Memorial Day, and Jerusalem Day;

Whereas the Congress recognizes that an understanding of the heritage of all American ethnic groups contributes to the unity of our country; and

Whereas intergroup understanding can be further fostered through an appreciation of the culture, history and traditions of the Jewish community and the contributions of Jews to our country and society; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 7, 1989, through May 14, 1989, is designated as "Jewish Heritage Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States, State and local government agencies, and interested organizations to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies, activities and programs.

NATIONAL WOMEN AND GIRLS IN SPORTS DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 32) to designate February 2, 1989, as "National Women and Girls in Sports Day" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble are as follows:

S.J. RES. 32

Whereas women's athletics is one of the most effective avenues available through which women of America may develop self-discipline, initiative, confidence, and leadership skills;

Whereas support and fitness activity contributes to emotional and physical well-being and women need strong bodies as well as strong minds;

Whereas the history of women in sports is rich and long, but there has been little national recognition of the significance of women's athletic achievements;

Whereas the number of women in leadership positions of coaches, officials, and administrators has declined drastically over the last decade and there is a need to restore women to these positions to ensure a fair representation of women's abilities and to provide role models for young female athletes;

Whereas the bonds built between women through athletics help to break down the social barriers of racism and prejudice;

Whereas the communication and cooperation skills learned through athletic experience play a key role in the athlete's contributions at home, at work, and to society;

Whereas women's athletics has produced such winners as Flo Hyman, whose spirit, talent, and accomplishments distinguished her above others and exhibited for all of us the true meaning of fairness, determination, and team play;

Whereas parents feel that sports are equally important for boys and girls and that sports and fitness activities provide important benefits to girls who participate;

Whereas early motor-skill training and enjoyable experiences of physical activity strongly influence life-long habits of physical fitness;

Whereas the performances of such female athletes as Jackie Joyner-Kersee, Florence Griffith Joyner, Bonnie Blair, Janet Evans, the U.S. Women's Basketball Team and many others in the 1988 Olympic Games were a source of inspiration and pride to all of us;

Whereas the athletic opportunities for male students at the collegiate and high school level remain significantly greater than those for female students; and

Whereas the number of funded research projects focusing on the specific needs of women athletes is limited and the information provided by these projects is imperative to the health and performance of future women athletes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That February 2, 1989, is hereby designated as "National Women and Girls in Sports Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon local and State jurisdictions, appropriate Federal agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

NATIONAL MINORITY CANCER AWARENESS WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 34) designating the week of April 16, 1989 through April 22, 1989, as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 34

Whereas the month of April each year is designated as National Cancer Month for the purpose of promoting increased awareness of the causes, types, and treatments of cancer;

Whereas the National Cancer Institute has recognized that significant differences exist in the incidence of cancer and survival rates for cancer patients between minority and economically disadvanged communities in the United States and the population in general;

Whereas increased awareness of the causes of cancer and available treatments will help reduce cancer rates among minorities and the economically disadvantaged through preventive measures and will improve survival rates for cancer patients through early diagnosis;

Whereas a comprehensive national approach is needed to increase awareness about cancer among minorities and economically disadvantaged persons, and to encourage health care professionals, researchers, and policy makers to develop solutions to the cancer-related problems unique to these communities; and

Whereas focusing public attention on cancer in minority and economically disadvantaged communities during one week so designated will have a positive impact on preventive health care and treatment in these communities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 16, 1989, through April 22, 1989, is designated as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week", and the President is autorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States and all Federal, State, and local government officials to observe the week with appropriate programs and activities.

NATIONAL OSTEOPOROSIS PREVENTION WEEK OF 1989

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 37) designating the week beginning May 14, 1989, as "National Osteoporosis Prevention Week of 1989" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 37

Whereas osteoporosis, a degenerative bone condition, afflicts 25,000,000 people in the United States;

Whereas osteoporosis afflicts 90 percent of women over age 75;

Whereas 50 percent of all women in the United States over age 45 will develop some form of osteoporosis;

Whereas hip fractures are the most disabling outcome of osteoporosis, and 32 percent of women and 17 percent of men who live to age 90 will likely suffer a hip fracture due primarily to osteoporosis;

Whereas the mortality rates for people who suffer a hip fracture increase by 20 percent, with such fractures resulting in the death of over 50,000 older women and many older men each year;

Whereas 15 to 25 percent of people who suffer a hip fracture stay in a long-term care facility for at least one year after the fracture occurs, and 25 to 35 percent of people who return home from a long-term care facility after recovering from a hip fracture require assistance with daily living after returning home;

Whereas the total cost to society of dealing with osteoporosis was over $10,000,000,000 in 1988 and such cost is expected to rise as the population ages;

Whereas osteoporosis is associated with the loss of bone mass due to a lack of estrogen as a result of menopause, alcohol or cigarett use, and low calcium intake;

Whereas exercise and proper nutrition before an individual is age 35 will build bone mass to help prevent osteoporosis; and

Whereas people who suffer from osteoporosis should be aware of the increased risk of bone fractures, and should take precautions to reduce the chance of accidents that may result in bone fractures due primarily to osteporosis: Now, therefore, be it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning May 14, 1989, is designated as "National Osteoporosis Prevention Week of 1989", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with approriate programs and activities.

NATIONAL STUDENT-ATHLETE DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 39) to designate April 6, 1989, as "National Student-Athlete Day" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 39

Whereas, the student-athlete represents a role model worthy of emulation by America's youth;

Whereas, the past athletic successes of many of America's business, governmental, and educational leaders dispell the myth that successful athletes are one-dimensional;

Whereas, such worthy values and behaviors as perseverance, teamwork, self-discipline, and commitment to a goal are fostered and promoted by both academic and athletic pursuits;

Whereas, participation in athletics, together with education, provides opportunities to develop valuable social and leadership skills and to gain an appreciation of ethnic and racial groups different from one's own;

Whereas, in spite of all the positive aspects of sport, overemphasis on sport at the expense of education can cause serious harm to an athlete's future;

Whereas, the pursuit of victory in athletics among our nation's schools and colleges too often leads to exploitation and abuse of the student-athelete;

Whereas, less than one in one hundred high school athletes ever play Division I college athletics;

Whereas, while college athletes in general graduate at the same rate as other students, less than 30 per centum of scholarship athletes in revenue producing sports even graduate;

Whereas, only one in ten thousand high school athletes who dream of a career in professional sports ever realize that aspiration, while those who do can expect a professional sports career of less than four years;

Whereas, thousands of America's youth sacrifice academic achievement to the dream of professional athletics;

Whereas, the practice of keeping athletes eligible for participation on a team, even at the high school level, must be abandoned for a policy of ensuring a meaningful education and degree;

Whereas, coaches, parents, and educators of student-athletes must express high expectations for academic performance as well as for athletic performance; and

Whereas, there is a need in this Nation to reemphasize the "student" in the term "student-athlete": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 6, 1989, is designated as "National Student-Athlete Day" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

NATIONAL ARBOR DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 40) to authorize the President to proclaim the last Friday of April 1989 as "National Arbor Day" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read third time, and passed.

The joint resolution is as follows:

S.J. RES. 40

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the last Friday of April 1989 as "National Arbor Day" and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such a day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

CRIME VICTIMS WEEK

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 44) designating the week of April 9, 1989, as "Crime Victims Week."

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased that we are today voting on Senate Joint Resolution 44, legislation which would designate the week of April 9-15, 1989, as "Crime Victims Week." Fifty-four Members of the Senate have joined me as cosponsors on this commemorative which focuses America's attention on the plight of the victims of crime.

It is a sad legacy that over the past few years, nearly 35 million Americans were victimized annually by criminal acts; 6 million individuals per year are raped, robbed, beaten, or murdered. The impact of crime is devastating to innocent victims and their families. In addition to the physical injuries and the financial losses, the victim is further scarred with the emotional loss of one's sense of dignity, security, and trust in other human beings. It is disturbing that the likelihood of becoming a victim of violent crime is now greater than that of being injured in an automobile accident.

Further compounding the pain and anguish victims must endure has been an historical insensitivity to their plight. The criminal justice system has oftentimes ignored the rights of victims before making crucial decisions regarding their cases or failed to notify them that a defendant had been released on bail. While the system offered legal representation and other forms of aid to the accused, it offered minimal assistance to the victim in recovering from the tremendous burden resulting from victimization.

Six years ago, the President's Task Force on Victims of Crime presented an agenda to correct these injustices and restore balance to the criminal justice system. At the Department of Justice, an Office for Victims of Crime was established within the Office of Justice Programs for the purpose of helping States implement the task force's recommendations. The Federal Government began awarding fines collected from convicted Federal offenders to the States to aid victims of crime. In addition, the National Victims Resource Center within the Office for Victims of Crime was established to provide information on victim assistance programs and laws. Largely as a result of these efforts, community programs for victims have grown in number and now every State has a designated agency responsible for victim services.

Much progress is being made to help the victims adjust, but much more needs to be done. Through the continued efforts of State and local governments and private organizations and concerned citizens, the trauma suffered by the innocent victims of crime will be eased.

The joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follow:

S.J. RES. 44

Whereas millions of Americans are victims of crime each year;

Whereas many of those crime victims are traumatized further by the physical, psychological, and financial burdens resulting from their victimizations;

Whereas the sensitivity of our Nation's criminal justice system must be improved when working with crime victims and their families.

Whereas much progress has been made to correct these injustices by implementing in the Federal, State, local, and private sectors the recommendations of the President's Task Forse on Victims of Crime; and

Whereas continuation of these efforts must be encouraged to ensure the restoration of balance to our Nation's criminal justice system and the fair and compassionate treatment of crime victims and their families; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 9, 1989, is designated as "Crime Victims Week", and the President is authorized and request to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 45) designating May 1989 as "Older Americans Month" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 45

Whereas older Americans have contributed many years of service to their families, their communities, and the Nation;

Whereas the population of the United States is comprised of a large percentage of older Americans representing a wealth of knowledge and experience;

Whereas older Americans should be acknowledged for the contributions they continue to make to their communities and the Nation; and

Whereas many States and communities acknowledge older Americans during the month of May: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in recognition of the traditional designation of the month of May as "Older Americans Month" and the repeated expression by the Congress of its appreciation and respect for the achievements of older Americans and its desire that these Americans continue to play an active role in the life of the Nation, the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May 1989 as "Older Americans Month" and calling on the people of the United States to observe that month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

NATIONAL CHILD CARE AWARENESS WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 50) to designate the week beginning April 2, 1989, as "National Child Care Awareness Week" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 50

Whereas the status and composition of the family in the United States is constantly changing;

Whereas today 57 percent of all women with children younger than six years of age work outside the home;

Whereas by 1995, two-thirds of all preschool children and more than three-quarters of all school-age children will have mothers in the work force;

Whereas the increasing participation of women in the work force will continue to increase the demand for child care during the working hours;

Whereas adequate child care is an increasingly important element in enhancing the productivity of the work force and enabling parents to receive additional job training;

Whereas child care experts have long known that a child's first five years are the ideal base to support lifelong learning, and child care providers in both homes and child care centers can provide vital assistance to parents in these critical years;

Whereas the collaboration of public and private efforts is essential to developing accessible, high quality child care;

Whereas the National Association for the Education of Young Children is sponsoring a week of the young child, and it is appropriate for Congress to designate the same week as a period devoted to increasing public awareness of child care issues;

Whereas communities across the United States are planning special activities to honor child care providers to illustrate the importance of high quality child care during that week; and

Whereas all children deserve high quality child care, and all parents have a profound obligation to provide a safe wholesome environment for their children at all times: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning April 2, 1989, is designated as "National Child Care Awareness Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

NATIONAL CANCER AWARENESS MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 51) to designate the month of April, 1989, as "National Cancer Awareness Month" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and the preamble, are as follow:

S.J. RES. 51

Whereas cancer is one of the most urgent medical challenges of our day;

Whereas an estimated 494,000 Americans died of cancer in 1988;

Whereas cancer is predicted to strike in three out of four American families during a lifetime;

Whereas 174,000 American lives can be saved this year through the early detection and treatment of cancer;

Whereas it is appropriate and cost-effective to focus the attention of the Nation on the importance of cancer research and preventative cancer examinations; and

Whereas there is good news concerning cancer with 3,000,000 Americans alive today who have been "cured" of cancer: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of April, 1989, is designated as "National Cancer Awareness Month", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

EXPRESSING GRATITUDE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT PERSONNEL

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 52) to express gratitude for law enforcement personnel was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follow:

S.J. RES. 52

Whereas the first day of May of each year has been designated as "Law Day U.S.A." and set aside as a special day to advance equality and justice under law, to encourage citizen support for law enforcement and law observance, and to foster respect for law and an understanding of the essential place of law in the life of every citizen of the United States;

Whereas each day police officers and other law enforcement personnel perform their duties unflinchingly and without hesitation;

Whereas each year tens of thousands of law enforcement personnel are injured or assaulted in the course of duty and many are killed;

Whereas law enforcement personnel are devoted to their jobs, are underpaid for their efforts, and are tireless in their work; and

Whereas law enforcement personnel perform their duties without adequate recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in celebration of "Law Day, U.S.A.", May 1, 1989, the grateful people of this Nation give special emphasis to all law enforcement personnel of the United States, and acknowledge the unflinching and devoted service law enforcement personnel perform as such personnel help preserve domestic tranquillity and guarantee the legal rights of all individuals of this Nation.

NATIONAL ORGAN AND TISSUE DONOR AWARENESS WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 56), designating April 23 through April 29, 1989, and the last week of April of each subsequent year as "National Organ and Tissue Donor Awareness Week", was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution is as follows:

S.J. RES. 56

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 23 through April 29, 1989, and the last full week of April of each subsequent year are designated as "National Organ and Tissue Donor Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation acknowledging such week.

HIGH SCHOOL RESERVE OFFICER TRAINING CORPS RECOGNITION DAY

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58) to designate May 17, 1989, as "High School Reserve Officer Training Corps Recognition Day."

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I urge the Senate to support Senate Joint Resolution 58, which declares May 17, 1989, as "High School Reserve Officer Training Corps Recognition Day."

This joint resolution was reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee on February 23, and is the first such joint resolution to come before the Senate to honor the dedicated young men and women who are involved in the high school ROTC Program.

I am pleased that this resolution has attracted broad bipartisan support, as demonstrated by the large number of Democrats and Republicans among the 56 cosponsors. Their support has been for good reason!

Since their establishment in 1916, the Reserve Officer Training Corps high school divisions have helped prepare hundreds of thousands of young men and women to take on the responsibilities of citizenship, once their high school years are completed.

Today, approximately 250,000 young men and women participate in the High School ROTC Program, which has nearly 1,500 Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps units.

Not only has this program given young cadets the opportunity to participate in vocational or academic high school ROTC programs while earning credit for graduation, but it has also given them the chance to understand the honor of serving our great country.

Through the High School ROTC Program, cadets have been able to provide service to their school and to their community while learning the importance of citizenship, leadership, teamwork, academic excellence, physical fitness, and self-confidence.

These are characteristics that are demonstrated in all walks of life by the military personnel, business professionals, writers, painters, and persons of countless other occupations who have had the experience of the Reserve Officer Training Corps.

While my own State of New Mexico ranks 25th in the Nation, according to the number of high school ROTC units—Texas, Florida, and California hold the top three spots—I can honestly say that the dedication, determination, and diligence that I have seen in New Mexico's 18 active units places us at the very top of the list when it comes to pride!

Our New Mexico cadets, however, share that pride with the remaining 1,454 high school units that make up the ROTC high school divisions throughout the United States, plus the Department of Defense Dependent Schools in the Caribbean, the Pacific, Asia, and Europe.

Mr. President, support for this resolution indicates support for the hard work and achievements of America's young citizens, instructors, and past participants of the High School ROTC Program. Frankly, their dedication deserves nothing less than our full support and encouragement.

The joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 58

Whereas in 1916 the Congress authorized the establishment of high school divisions of the Reserve Officer Training Corps;

Whereas hundreds of high schools across the United States, and United States operated high schools abroad, offer High School Reserve Officer Training Corps programs of the various military services;

Whereas High School Reserve Officer Training Corps programs have provided a valuable and unique learning opportunity for hundreds of thousands of high school students for almost four generations;

Whereas the programs of instruction for High School Reserve Officer Training Corps units concentrate on the development of desirable traits in its participants, such as good citizenship, leadership, teamwork, individual initiative, and pride and respect for the United States, its flag, laws, and Constitution;

Whereas the High School Reserve Officer Training Corps programs, being highly successful in developing desirable traits in its participants, have made a valuable contribution to the United States and to the education of the youth of our Nation;

Whereas it is appropriate to acknowledge and honor the contribution of the High School Reserve Officer Training Corps, and its cadets and instructors, both past and present; and

Whereas May 17, 1989, marks the seventy-third anniversity of the authorization of the High School Reserve Officer Training Corps: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 17, 1989, is hereby designated as "High School Reserve Officer Training Corps Recognition Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activies.

NATIONAL DRINKING WATER WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 60) to designate the period commencing on May 1, 1989, and ending on May 7, 1989, as "National Drinking Water Week" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 60

Whereas water itself is God-given, and the drinking water that flows dependably through our household taps results from the dedication of men and women who operate the public water systems of collection, storage, treatment, testing, and distribution that insures that drinking water is available, affordable, and of unquestionable quality;

Whereas the advances in health effects research and water analysis and treatment technologies, in conjunction with the Safe Drinking Water Act Amendments of 1986 (Public Law 99-339), could create major changes in the production and distribution of drinking water;

Whereas this substance, which the public uses with confidence in so many productive ways, is without doubt the single most important product in the world and a significant issue of the future;

Whereas the public expects high quality drinking water to always be there when needed; and

Whereas the public continues to increase its demand for drinking water of unquestionable quality: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the period commencing on May 1, 1989, is designed as "National Drinking Water Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such period with appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs designed to enhance public awareness of drinking water issues and public recognition of the difference that drinking water makes to the health safety, and quality of the life we enjoy.

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 63) designating June 14, 1989, as "Baltic Freedom Day," and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 63

Whereas the people of the Republics of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia (hereinafter referred to as the "Baltic Republics") have cherished the principles of religious and political freedom and independence;

Whereas the Baltic Republics existed as independent, sovereign nations and as fully recognized members of the League of Nations;

Whereas 1989 marks the 50th anniversary of the infamous Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact in which the Soviet Union colluded with Nazi Germany, thus allowing the Soviet Union in 1940 to illegally seize and occupy the Baltic Republics and to incorporate such republics by force into the Soviet Union against the national will and the desire for independence and freedom of the people of such republics;

Whereas due to Soviet and Nazi tyranny, by the end of World War II, 20 percent of the total population of the Baltic Republics had been lost;

Whereas the people of the Baltic Republics have individual and separate cultures and national traditions and languages which are distinctively foreign to those of Russia;

Whereas since 1940, the Soviet Union has systematically implemented Baltic genocide by deporting native Baltic peoples from Baltic homelands to forced labor and concentration camps in Siberia and elsewhere;

Whereas by relocting masses of Russians to the Baltic Republics, the Soviet Union has threatened the Baltic cultures with extinction through russification;

Whereas through a program of russification, the Soviet Union has introduced ecologically unsound industries without proper safeguards into the Baltic Republics, and the presence of such industries has resulted in deleterious effects on the environment and well-being of the Baltic people;

Whereas the Soviet Union, despite recent pronouncements of openness and restructuring, has imposed upon the captive people of the Baltic Republics an oppressive political system which has destroyed every vestige of democracy, civil liberty, and religious freedom;

Whereas the people of the Baltic Republics are subjugated by the Soviet Union, are locked into a union such people deplore, are denied basic human rights, and are persecuted for daring to protest;

Whereas the Soviet Union refuses to abide by the Helsinki accords which the Soviet Union voluntarily signed;

Whereas the United States stands as a champion of liberty, is dedicated to the principles of national self-determination, human rights, and religious freedom, and is opposed to oppression and imperialism;

Whereas the United States, as a member of the United Nations, had repeatedly voted with a majority of that international body to uphold the right of other countries of the world to self-determination and freedom from foreign domination;

Whereas the Soviet Union has steadfastly refused to return to the people of the Baltic Republics the right to exist as independent republics, separate and apart from the Soviet Union, or to permit a return of personal, political and religious freedoms; and

Whereas 1989 marks the 49th anniversary of the continued policy of the United States of not recognizing the illegal forcible occupation of the Baltic Republics by the Soviet Union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

(1) the Congress recognizes the continuing desire and right of the people of the Baltic Republics for freedom and independence from the domination of the Soviet Union;

(2) the Congress deplores the refusal of the Soviet Union to recognize the sovereignty of the Baltic Republics and to yield to the rightful demands for independence from foreign domination and oppression by the people of the Baltic Republics;

(3) June 14, 1989, the anniversary of the mass deportation of Baltic peoples from their homelands in 1941, is designated as "Baltic Freedom Day", as a symbol of the solidarity of the people of the United States with the aspirations of the enslaved Baltic people; and

(4) the President is authorized and requested—

(A) to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe Baltic Freedom Day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and

(B) to call upon the Soviet Union, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Democratic Republic of Germany to renounce the acquisition or absorption of the Baltic Republics by the Soviet Union as a result of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.

SENATE RESOLUTION 68 INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 68 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER AUTHORIZING FILING OF REPORTS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Armed Services Committee be permitted to file its report this evening on the nomination of John G. Tower, to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I assume that includes the filing of the minority report.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, indeed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT—SENATE RESOLUTION 72

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate considers the resolution regarding the author Salman Rusdie to be offered by myself and others, it be considered under the following time limitation, which is to say 20 minutes on the resolution to be equally divided between myself and the Republican leader or his designee with no amendments or motions to be in order with respect to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is to ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

RESOLUTION CONDEMNING THE THREATS AGAINST THE AUTHOR AND PUBLISHERS OF THE "SATANIC VERSES"

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution condemning the threats against the author and publishers of the "Satanic Verses." I do so for myself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PELL, Mr. HELMS, Mr. SAN-

FORD, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. D'AMATO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 72) condemning the threats against the author and publishers of "Satanic Verses."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this matter was on the Senate floor last week, and only a long meeting of the Committee on Armed Services prevented our adopting it.

It states in the most emphatic terms that the United States absolutely rejects the intellectual terrorism practiced by the Ayatollah Khomeini. He has called for the assassination of a Moslem-born author residing in Britain. He has also called for attacks upon, vengeance upon, and violence to the publishers of "Satanic Verses," Viking Penguin in New York.

Let it be understood in the parts of the world from whence such threats emanate: We are not intimidated and the resources of civilization against its enemies are not exhausted.

It is important to note that this resolution is sponsored by the chairman and ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and of course by our distinguished leaders, the majority leader and the Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the principal author, Senator MOYNIHAN, with the distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL; with Senators PELL, HELMS, GORTON, D'AMATO and others—in cosponsoring this important resolution. I also want to note the contribution that Senator WALLOP has made to the crafting of this resolution, and to the effort to get Senate action on this important subject.

We are not here as book critics. I haven't read the book in question, and I do not intend to. And we are not here to pass judgment on anyone's religions views. That is not the job of the Senate.

But it is not only the job, but the responsibility, of the Senate to say, loud and clear: There is an internationally recognized standard of civilized behavior; and it never includes levying international "death warrants," without any due process or recognition of individual rights, on anyone—author, publisher, or anyone else.

And it is also our responsibility to reaffirm our four square, unequivocal opposition to terrorism in all its forms—whether it is the terrorism of an individual fanatic, like the Ayatollah Khomeini: of the terrorism of the state that he runs with an iron fist, and a heart of hate and intolerance; or the terrorism of a mob.

Terrorism is terrorism. It is abhorrent. It must be condemned. There is no justification for it, period.

That is the policy of this country, and of civilized countries everywhere. That is the essence of this resolution.

Let us underscore our continuing commitment to this policy, this strong and necessary policy, by passing this resolution. And let that act be encouragement to those who refuse to buckle under to the threats of terrorists, and a rebuke to the Khomeinis of the world, who care not a whit for anyone's rights or beliefs but their own.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I have also to inform the Senate of something we had thought would not happen in our State of New York. Early this morning the office of the Riverdale Press, a highly respected weekly newspaper in New York City, was fire bombed and all but destroyed.

This was done in the aftermath of an editorial published by that newspaper; a thoughful, moderate, but firm editorial defending the right to publish, to distribute and to sell. The editorial comment was entitled "The Tyrant and His Chains," and begins, "How fragile civilization is; how easily, how merrily a book burns."

Mr. President, as a statement of solidarity with the publishers of the Riverdale Press, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TYRANT AND HIS CHAINS

How fragile civilization is; how easily, how merrily a book burns," wrote Salman Rushdie when a group of English Moslems publicly burned copies of his novel, "The Satanic Verses," in West Yorkshire last month.

The powers of reason and imagination are indeed the underpinnings of our civilization. To suppress a book or punish an idea is to express contempt for the people who read the book or consider the idea. In preferring the logic of the executioner to the logic of debate, the bookburners and the Ayatollah Khomeini display their distrust for the principle on which self-government rests, the wisdom and virtue of ordinary people.

Americans are fighting back in the most appropriate way possible, by reading and talking about Mr. Rushdie's book. But the cowardly connivance of the big book chains with the Ayatollah is placing obstacles in the way of this counter-attack.

Waldenbooks, the nation's largest chain, began the retreat last Thursday when it removed the book from the shelves of its 1,200 stores. B. Dalton and Barnes & Noble dropped the book the next day, adding another 1,250 stores that won't carry it.

In Riverdale, we're fortunate to have an independent book seller. Readers, not fearful executives, had stripped Paperbacks Plus of "The Satanic Verses" by this weekend. The store has reordered the book and will continue to sell it.

In much of the country however, the big chains are the only game in town. They account for an estimated 20 to 30 percent of all book sales, and their power can make or break a title. Will Viking continue to order reprintings of "The Satanic Verses", if so will many stores refuse to sell it? If not, the chains will have helped win a victory for terrorism.

The chain store executives excuse their surrender to the Ayatollah by expressing concern for the wellbeing of their employees, but by knuckling under they've put others at risk. If a threat can knock the books from the shelves of the Big Three, terrorists may reason, think what a bomb in an uncompliant bookstore could do.

Moreover, terrorism feeds on its successes. What will Waldenbooks do when a homegrown would-be tyrant demands the removal of a politically controversial book from its shelves? And how will it handle the next step, a demand that stores stock a particular book?

The bookstore chains have enormous power. Their decisions can determine what thoughts are disseminated in what form. With that power should go responsibility. Selling books is not the same as selling socks or sundries. Book stores sell ideas and visions; they feed the mind and spirit. They have an obligation to safeguard the freedom of expression.

Independent book stores can't match the buying power of the chains, and therefore can't match their discounted prices. Their proprietors like to say that what they offer to readers who pay full price for their books is service. To that, they can now add something more important: the small additional cost is the price of freedom.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate. This is a matter which has been thoroughly agreed to and I think that it would receive the unanimous support of the body.

I do not observe a representative of the Republican leader on the floor at this point. We have concluded our business for the day.

And knowing that, he is a cosponsor, a principal cosponsor, in the circumstances I would ask whether I might move to have both sides yield back their time under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can certainly do that by consent.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I do ask unanimous consent that both sides yield back their time under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. In that case, Mr. President, I move adoption of the sense-of-the-Senate resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 72) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 72

Whereas, on February 14, 1989, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of the Islamic Republic of Iran called for the assassination of Salman Rushdie, author of "Satanic Verses," and of the officers of Viking, the U.S. publisher of the book;

Whereas, Viking officers have received death threats since the publication of the book, and Viking offices have been evacuated several times following bomb threats;

Whereas on February 21, 1989, President George Bush condemned Iran's threat against Mr. Rushdie and his publisher as "deeply offensive to the norms of civilized behavior": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That in recognition of threats of violence made against the above mentioned author and publisher, the Senate—

(1) declares its commitment to protect the right of any person to write, publish, sell, buy, and read books without fear of intimidation and violence;

(2) unequivocally condemns as state-sponsored terrorism, the threat of the government of Iran and Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to assassinate citizens of other countries on foreign soil;

(3) expresses its support for the publishers and booksellers who have courageously printed, distributed, sold, and displayed "Satanic Verses" despite the threats they have received;

(4) applauds President Bush for his strongly worded statement of outrage against the Iranian government's actions and calls upon the President to continue to condemn publicly any and all threat's made against the author and his publishers;

(5) commends the European Community member states for withdrawing their diplomatic corps from Iran in response to the Ayatollah's death sentences;

(6) recognizes the sensitivity of religious beliefs and practices, respects all religions and the commitment of the religious to their faith, and repudiates religious intolerance and bigotry, and

(7) calls upon the President of the United States to take swift and proportionate action in consultation, as appropriate, with other interested governments, in the event that violent acts should occur.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for its great courtesy. I hope that the Nation and the world will take note that the Senate has spoken.

I say once again that this would have occurred last week save for a certain inadvertence in a committee schedule.

Mr. President, I see no one else seeking the floor, and I accordingly suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF JOHN TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, relative to the Tower nomination, I made an interesting calculation today, or I should say I asked my staff to do it. Here is what they found: Among the Members of this body who are now holding office, there is a corporate knowledge of John Tower totaling 651 years.

This Senator has known Senator Tower for 10 years. I served with him for 6 years on the Armed Services Committee for I suppose thousands of hours in public and observed Senator Tower for scores of hours in private during those 6 years. And never once did this Senator see John Tower compromised in any way. I never saw him drink excessively, can barely remember him ever taking a drink, never saw him drink excessively, never saw him in any way under the influence of alcohol, certainly never saw him inebriated in public or in private at any time; never saw him compromised in any way, in any respect; never saw him compromised, period, in those 10 years, 6 years at close range.

So my part of that 651 years, that 6½ centuries of corporate personal knowledge, which this body possesses of the nominee, my part is 10 years. But my observations, as I gather, are not the least bit unique. There is not another Senator whom I have asked who ever saw John Tower in any way compromised.

We know that the FBI solicited opinions and recollections from a number of Senators, I am not sure quite on what basis those Senators were chosen, but it was clear that the FBI was soliciting from this body opinions and none of those Senators who were interviewed could recollect Senator Tower ever being compromised in any way. And we know for a fact, that those Senators who have known John Tower and whose corporate knowledge is 651 years, none of them have ever come forward either to the FBI in private, even on the basis of anonymity which the FBI offers, to say that they thought John Tower was in any way ill-suited or unsuited to this position; 651 years of knowledge and apparently some Members are prepared to throw that out in favor of a few ratty, unsubstantiated allegations in this FBI report.

I think that indicates what is going on here. It is preposterous, it is disturbing, and it is beginning to form a pattern, it seems to this Senator. This is Bork all over. I am not going to get into the Bork nomination, but it is the same tactic—smear, innuendo, false charges, name calling.

In my view, the real basis of opposition to John Tower, for the most part, is that he is very bright, probably has a more extensive knowledge, a greater expertise in defense matters than any citizen of this country. There might be two or three who exceed—I doubt it, but it is possible—John Tower's expertise. He is smart, he is expert, he is tough. That is probably his problem—he is tough. He is a tough Texan, a scrappy little guy. If he were an eastern establishment effete type, he would probably have clear sailing. But he is tough and he was very tough as chairman of that committee and he stepped on a lot of toes and now that is coming back to haunt him, in my opinion.

How else can you explain it? Throwing away 651 years of firsthand, close-up observation, not occasional observation, daily, virtually daily, observation. Makes you wonder what is going on here. It is pretty disillusioning to this Senator.

The FBI has investigated this nominee more thoroughly—not that he deserved it, but because of the way the process has been strung out and the invitation has been hung out for any malcontent in America who was willing to come forward, even on the telephone, with an anonymous charge and allegation. In any event, there can be no doubt that this nominee has been more thoroughly investigated than any nominee for any office requiring Senate confirmation in the history of this country.

Until just this week, that FBI report was not available to the bulk of the Members of this body. It was available only to the Armed Services Committee members. But, inasmuch as the Armed Services Committee has now acted as of last week, the report is available this week to the rest of us.

Like so many others, I have been trying to find time to leaf through that tome. The summary, Mr. President, as the Chair well knows—I observed him in the secure room today reading it conscientiously—the summary is about this thick and it is not even double spaced. It is a massive undertaking to review it.

I have been giving special attention to the sections devoted to the allegations that Senator Tower has drinking problems. I am not going to say that I have completed that yet because I have not been able to find enough time because, as I have said, anyone can get himself or herself recorded in an FBI investigation of this kind even on an anonymous basis, and it all gets very thoroughly documented. I have not finished it yet, but I am about halfway through these allegations that relate to the drinking charge. So far, so far, it appears to me that the White House is correct in its characterization.

The White House is saying that there are no charges relative to drinking allegations, there are no charges by persons willing to have their names used; that is to say, if you throw out the anonymous allegations, if you focus only on the allegations of persons who are willing to have their names used on a confidential basis, privacy and confidentiality protected, a name shared only with 100 citizens in this country who happen to be Members of this body, if you take just those, according to my reading so far, there is no one allegation that is corroborated by a second party. Many of those allegations are disputed by second parties.

Well, I wanted to share that with whoever might be listening. Six hundred and fifty-one years of direct, personal, intimate contact with this man John Tower and some are prepared to give that about as much weight I guess as a feather duster and to give immense weight to this other rubbish.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and treaties which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES UNDER THE HIGHWAY SAFETY ACT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 22

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

The Highway Safety Act and the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act, both enacted in 1966, initiated a national effort to reduce traffic deaths and injuries and require annual reports on the administration of the Acts. This is the 21st year that these reports have been prepared.

The report on motor vehicle safety includes the annual reporting requirement in Title I of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act of 1972 (bumper standards).

In the Highway Safety Acts of 1973, 1976, and 1978, the Congress expressed its special interest in certain aspects of traffic safety that are addressed in the volume on highway safety.

The national outrage against drunk drivers, combined with growing safety belt use and voluntary cooperation we have received from all sectors of American life, have brought about even more improvements in traffic safety.

In addition, despite large increases in the number of drivers and vehicles, the Federal standards and programs for motor vehicle and highway safety instituted since 1966 have contributed to a significant reduction in the fatality rate per 100 million miles of travel. The rate decreased from 5.5 in the mid-60's to the 1987 level of 2.4, the lowest in our history.

The important progress we have made is, of course, no consolation to the relatives and friends of those 46,386 people who, despite the safety advances and greater public awareness, lost their lives in 1987. But it is indicative of the positive trend established toward making our roads safer.

The loss of approximately 127 lives per day on our Nation's highways is still too high. Also, with the increasing motor vehicle travel, we are faced with the threat of an even higher number of traffic fatalities. Therefore, there is a continuing need for effective motor vehicle and highway safety programs.

We will continue to pursue highway and motor vehicle safety programs that are most effective in reducing deaths and injuries. We are convinced that significant progress in traffic safety can be achieved through the combined efforts of government, industry, and the public.

NATIONAL TRADE POLICY AGENDA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 23

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying reports; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 1641 of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-418; 102 Stat. 1271), I hereby transmit the National Trade Policy Agenda for calendar year 1989; and an addendum to the Twenty-ninth Annual Report on the Trade Agreements Program, 1988, that was sent to the Congress on January 3, 1989. The addendum includes a statement on negotiations in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) regarding an import fee for trade adjustment as required by Section 1428 of that Act.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 28, 1989.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 453. A bill to amend the National Apprenticeship Act to require minimum funding for certain outreach recruitment and training programs, to restore a national information collection system, to limit the authority to conduct reductions in force within the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training of the Department of Labor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

APPRENTICESHIP IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Apprenticeship Improvement Act of 1989 to strengthen the ability of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training [BAT] to meet the demand for highly skilled and technically proficient workers for the remainder of this decade and beyond. I am happy to have my friend and colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, as a cosponsor of this legislation.

A properly trained and skilled work force is vital to the effort to rebuild and maintain our country's stature in an increasingly competitive world economy. Since colonial times, apprenticeship training has effectively provided American workers with the skills needed for highly skilled occupations. Enhancing the availability of apprenticeship training offers a low cost way to maintain and expand the quality of our Nation's work force.

The Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training in Department of Labor is charged with the regulation and development of apprenticeship programs. Unfortunately, the staff of the Bureau has been decimated by budget cuts in recent years. During the 1980's, BAT has had its staff cut nearly in half. BAT offices in several major metropolitan areas have been closed and, as a result, several important services have been discontinued.

The apprenticeship system of training is a totally voluntary system with no financial incentives. The successes or failures of the system can be linked directly to the efforts of the individual BAT field staff to promote or sell apprenticeship to the private sector employers and labor unions. There are also linkages with other Federal, State, and local organizations, government officials, legislatures, school districts, community colleges, vocational education, veterans representatives, womens' organizations, minority organizations, and others interested in training and developing skilled workers. BAT staff generally are the only Federal Government representatives working at the State and local level for that purpose. In many cases there is only one BAT staff member to cover an entire State.

Ironically, the Department itself has indicated that the apprenticeship concept should be expanded, not reduced, as an instrument of labor policy. It has been conducting extensive research and soliciting public comment for over a year as part of its Apprenticeship 2000 initiative.

However, the BAT field staff currently are spread too thin to effectively carry out the missions and functions necessary for promoting and maintaining the apprenticeship system. The current staffing level is wholly inadequate to meet current needs, much less the expansion into new occupations contemplated by the Labor Department's Apprenticeship 2000 initiative. Any reassignment of existing staff to the expansion of the concept would doubtless result in a further deterioration of the traditional apprenticeship programs, which have served the construction and manufacturing industries so well.

Mr. President, I introduce the Apprenticeship Improvement Act of 1989 to reaffirm Congress' commitment to apprenticeship and training. The legislation would increase the staff of the Bureau to at least 377 full time employees. In addition, the bill would:

Limit the authority to conduct reductions in force within the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training by disallowing such a reduction if it would reduce the number of civilian employees within the Bureau to fewer than 377 full time employees.

Require a set-aside of 1 percent of the funds for outreach, recruitment, and training programs to increase the participation of women, minorities, handicapped, displaced workers, and the disadvantaged.

Require the Secretary of Labor to submit to Congress within 6 months of enactment a detailed report concerning the Department's directive to determine whether apprenticeship programs comply with regulations governing equal opportunity. The report will include a detailed description of activities carried out by the Department to ensure such compliance, a list of compliance reviews undertaken, and a report describing any sanctions imposed as a result of compliance reviews.

Require the Secretary to establish and maintain a national information collection system for apprenticeships and apprenticeship programs.

Mr. President, the future of the American work force is much too important to allow a program such as this to continue to deteriorate. The increase in the number of BAT positions is moderate. The number would not reach the 1981 level of 459 full time positions, but would exceed the present level of 247 positions.

Further the bill would elevate the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training to a more important place in the Department of Labor by putting it within the Office of the Secretary headed by an administrator reporting directly to him or her.

I urge my colleagues to support these necessary changes.

I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 453

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Apprenticeship Improvement Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. ESTABLISHMENT OF INFORMATION COLLECTION SYSTEM.

Section 2 of the Act of August 16, 1937, (50 Stat. 664; 29 U.S.C. 50), popularly known as the "National Apprenticeship Act", (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Act") is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 2.", and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Secretary shall establish and maintain a national information collection system for apprenticeships and apprenticeship programs.".

SEC. 3. OUTREACH PROGRAM.

The Act is further amended—

(1) by redesignating section 4 as section 5, and

(2) by inserting after section 3 the following new section:

"SEC. 4. The Secretary shall assure that from the amounts appropriated to carry out this Act in each fiscal year, not less than 1 percent of such amounts shall be available to establish outreach recruitment activities to increase the participation of women, minorities, handicapped individuals, displaced workers, and disadvantaged individuals in the apprenticeship programs authorized by this Act.".

SEC. 4. ESTABLISHMENT OF BUREAU OF APPRENTICESHIP AND TRAINING; APPOINTMENT OF EMPLOYEES.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established in the Department of Labor, the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Bureau") which shall carry out the policies and functions of this act in behalf of the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary"). The Bureau shall be under the direction of an administrator to be known as the Administrator of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training. The Administrator shall report directly to the Secretary.

(b) TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS.—Functions of the Assistant Secretary for Employment and Training Administration of the Department of Labor with respect to the promotion of labor standards of apprenticeship, including research, information, and publications are transferred to the Bureau. Functions related to apprenticeship, including appropriate administrative and program support services, together with personnel necessary to the administration of such functions, and unexpended balances of appropriations and other funds related thereto, are transferred to the Bureau.

(c) APPOINTMENT OF EMPLOYEES.—The Secretary is authorized to appoint such employees as may be necessary for the administration of this Act in accordance with laws applicable to the appointment and compensation of employees and advisors of the United States.

SEC. 5. INCREASE IN FORCE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall increase the force within the Bureau to 377 full-time employees no later than January 1, 1990.

(b) CONSIDERATION OF EMPLOYEES WORKING LESS THAN FULL TIME.—In the administration of subsection (a)—

(1) a part-time employee shall be counted as a fraction, the numerator of which is the number corresponding to the average number of hours in such employee's regularly scheduled workweek and the denominator of which is 40; and

(2) an individual employed on a temporary or intermittent basis shall not be counted.

SEC. 6. LIMITATIONS ON REDUCTION IN FORCE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—A reduction in force may not be conducted within the Bureau if—

(1) the reduction in force would reduce the total number of civilian employees within such Bureau; and

(2) such total number, after the reduction in force, would be less than the equivalent of 377 full-time employees.

(b) CONSIDERATION OF EMPLOYEES WORKING LESS THAN FULL TIME.—In the administration of subsection (a)—

(1) a part-time employee shall be counted as a fraction, the numerator of which is the number corresponding to the average number of hours in such employee's regularly scheduled workweek and the denominator of which is 40; and

(2) an individual employed on a temporary or intermittent basis shall not be counted.

SEC. 7. REPORT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall prepare and submit to the Congress, not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act, a detailed report concerning whether the apprenticeship program conducted by the Department of Labor under the Act of August 16, 1937 (50 Stat. 664; 29 U.S.C. 50), complies with regulations governing equal opportunity.

(b) CONTENTS OF REPORT.—The report required by this section shall include—

(1) a detailed description of activities carried out by the Department of Labor to ensure compliance;

(2) a list of compliance reviews undertaken by the Department; and

(3) a description of any sanctions imposed as a result of the compliance reviews.

S. 454. A bill to provide additional funding for the Appalachian development highway system; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

S. 455. A bill to extend the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 and to provide authorizations for the Appalachian Highway and Appalachian Area Development Programs; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CORRIDOR 2000 INITIATIVE AND REAUTHORIZATION OF APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today, along with the distinguished senior Senator from my State of West Virginia, I am very pleased to introduce two pieces of legislation that are vitally important to my State of West Virginia and the Appalachian region. The first piece of legislation that I am introducing today will provide for the completion of the Appalachian Corridor Highway system by the year 2000. This legislation is dependent on a second piece of legislation which reauthorizes the Appalachian Regional Commission for a period of 5 years, which I am also introducing today. A companion bill is being introduced in the House of Representatives today by Congressman NICK RAHALL. The bill is being cosponsored by the entire West Virginia delegation.

In 1965, the Federal Government made a commitment to Appalachia to provide the assistance necessary to bring the region into economic parity with the rest of the Nation. This commitment has not been upheld. The gap has been narrowed in some areas of Appalachia, but we are not at par with the rest of the Nation. We must continue to receive special consideration. The Appalachian Regional Commission has been and is still the instrument to accomplish this goal.

The Appalachian Regional Commission has been marked for termination by the administration since 1981. In 1981, the Governors of the Appalachian States, and I was one of them, asserted that the work of the ARC was not complete, but we agreed to a finish-up plan. This plan would have provided for an orderly completion of the ARC efforts already in progress.

This planned finish up was not possible because the money was not available. The Federal Government made a commitment to the region in 1965 and again in 1981, but neither of these commitments have been upheld.

As a result of appropriations by Congress the ARC has survived, but the effectiveness of the Commission to impact the lives of those living in some of the most distressed areas of the Nation has been severly diminished. This year the region, which includes portions of Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and all of West Virgina, received $107 million.

During the last quarter of a century progress has been made in fulfilling the objectives of the Appalachian Regional Commission. Jobs have been created, infant mortality has been halved, substandard housing has been reduced, but much remains to be done. Accordingly to a recent typology prepared by the Appalachian Regional Commission, there are 272 distressed counties in the Nation and of these, 82 are in Appalachia. Nearly one-quarter of Appalachia is distressed. This figure compares to 8 percent for the rest of the Nation. Other key indicators of economic and social welfare consistently lag behind the rest of the Nation.

The legislation that is being introduced to reauthorize the Appalachian Regional Commission will enable both the highway and the area development programs to continue for a period of 5 years. The highway program will be authorized at $144 million dollars per year and the area development program, which provides for black lung clinics, water, sewer, and many other basic human services, will be authorized at $41 million for an annual total of $185 million.

However, reauthorization of the ARC alone will not be enough to complete the 1,000 miles of the Appalachian corridor system that remain to be completed. My second piece of legislation, which is dependent on the reauthorization of the ARC, will require that we tap the highway trust fund surplus to supplement the ARC funding.

My plan calls for a $2 bonus from the trust fund surplus for every dollar that a State commits to the program from its annual Federal highway allocation. In addition, each Appalachian State would have to provide the required 20-percent match for Federal funds. The trust fund bonus would be limited to twice the amount of ARC funding that participating States receive. The program would be totally permissive and should a State choose not to participate, it would not impact their ARC funding.

When the Commission was established in 1965, a major goal was to connect Appalachia with the more prosperous and highly developed regions on either side of the mountains. This highway system would link isolated areas of Appalachia to national markets, a key component in the effort to make the industrial and commercial resources more competitive.

Between 1980 and 1986, 81 percent of the jobs in the region were in counties with completed interstates or corridors. This is a compelling argument for finishing these highways.

I admit that my proposal is ambitious, bold, and aggressive, but this is the attitude that we have to have if we are going to make progress. If we were to continue to fund the corridors at the current rate, they will not be completed until 2065. We cannot wait that long.

My proposal does not request an additional appropriation for the completion of these highways. I want to use funding that has already been collected for the purpose of highway construction.

When the current highway authorization ends in 1991, the bills will come in for 2 years. The gasoline tax is authorized until 1993 to cover these commitments. At the end of 1993, there will be a balance of $6 billion in the trust fund. I think that anyone would call this a surplus.

This balance of $6 billion assumes that the gasoline tax stops the day the commitments are paid. We know that is not going to happen. We will have another highway bill and a continuance of the gasoline tax. However, the next highway bill will not have to dedicate $3.15 billion per year to the Interstate System so those funds will be available for other projects in fiscal year 1994.

States will have to make some tough choices if they are to complete their corridors under this plan by the year 2000. They will have to make sacrifices. By giving up a portion of their annual Federal highway allocation to corridor construction and providing a 20-percent match from State funds, many other pressing highway needs will not be met. In my State of West Virginia, Governor Caperton has increased the gasoline tax and dedicated half of the proceeds to corridor construction.

These roads "halfway to nowhere" are ludicrous. We must complete them. It is certainly the key to economic development of the region. It is, in many cases, our last hope.

In West Virginia, 144 miles of a 410-mile system remain to be completed. There are four corridors which will require construction or substantial upgrading, D, G, H, and L. The largest of these is H which would connect the eastern portion of my State to the Washington-Baltimore area. This area of the State has some of the premier tourist spots, but the accessibility is limited. If we were to open this area of the State, it would provide access to an enormous tourism market creating jobs for West Virginians.

The programs of ARC are a partnership between the Federal, State and local governments. The Federal Government must not be allowed to walk away from its commitment to that partnership—and investment—because of a lack of funding. It is in part due to that partnership that life is better and opportunities are greater for the men, women, and children who live in the 397 counties of the 13 States of Appalachia. But the hopes and dreams of those people, especially the young ones, should not be left unrealized.

I feel that we have a compelling case for reauthorizing the Appalachian Regional Commission and completing the Appalachian corridor system by the year 2000. In the bipartisan footsteps of Jennings Randolph and John Sherman Cooper, let us fulfill our commitment to Appalachia.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 454

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Subsection (g) of section 201 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 (40 U.S.C. App. 201) is amended to read as follows:

"(g)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated—

"(A) $144,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this section other than paragraph (2) for fiscal year 1990, and

"(B) such sums as may be necessary to carry out such provisions for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, and 1994.

Any amounts appropriated under the authority of this paragraph shall remain available without fiscal year limitation until expended.

"(2)(A) There are authorized to be appropriated out of the Highway Trust Fund (other than the Mass Transit Account)—

"(i) $287,000,000 for fiscal year 1990, and

"(ii) such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, and 1994.

to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(B) The Commission shall allocate the funds appropriated under the authority of subparagraph (A) among the States within the Appalachian region in a manner that ensures that the total amount allocated to each State for each fiscal year does not exceed the lesser of—

"(i) an amount equal to twice the amount of funds appropriated under the authority of paragraph (1) that are allocated to that State for such fiscal year, or

"(ii) an amount equal to twice the amount of Federal funds provided under any provision of law other than this section that are to be expended by that State during such fiscal year for highways on the Appalachian development highway system and local access roads serving the Appalachian region.

"(C) Funds appropriated under the authority of subparagraph (A) shall not be subject to, or taken into account under, any limitation imposed by any provision of law on obligations for Federal-aid highways, unless such law specifically cites this subparagraph.

"(D) Funds appropriated under the authority of this paragraph shall remain available without fiscal year limitation until expended.".

SEC. 2. Subsection (a) of section 201 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 (40 U.S.C. App. 201(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "118" and inserting in lieu thereof "118(a)", and

(2) by striking out ", period of availability,".

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Appalachian Regional Development Act Amendments of 1989".

SEC. 2. Section 2(a) of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 (40 App. U.S.C. 105) is amended by striking out the period at the end of the sixth sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and in severely distressed and underdeveloped counties or areas lacking resources for basic services.".

SEC. 3. Subsection (b) of section 105 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Commission to carry out the provisions of this section $3,500,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, and 1994. Not more than $1,000,000 of the amounts appropriated pursuant to the preceding sentence for each fiscal year shall be available for expenses of the Federal cochairman, alternate, and the Federal staff.".

SEC. 4. Section 106(7) of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended by striking out "1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "1994".

SEC. 5. (a) Subsection (g) of section 201 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"(g) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this section $144,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990), 1991, 1992, 1993, and 1994.".

(b)(1) Section 201(h)(1) of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended by striking out "70 per centum" and inserting in lieu thereof "80 percent".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply with respect to projects approved after March 31, 1979.

SEC. 6. Section 214(c) of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended—

(1) by striking out "December 31, 1980" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1994", and

(2) by inserting "authorized by title 23, United States Code" after "road construction" in the second sentence.

SEC. 7. Section 224(a)(1) of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended by striking out the semicolon at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following "or in a severely distressed and underdeveloped county or area lacking resources for basic services;".

SEC. 8. Section 401 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 401. In addition to the appropriations authorized in section 105 for administrative expenses, and in section 201(g) for the Appalachian development highway system and local access roads, there are authorized to be appropriated, to remain available until expended, to carry out this Act, $37,500,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, and 1994.".

SEC. 9. Section 405 of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 is amended by striking out "1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "1994".●

By Mr. JOHNSTON (by request):

S. 456. A bill to amend the National Trails System Act to designate the California National Historic Trail and Pony Express National Historic Trail as components of the National Trails System; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

DESIGNATION OF COMPONENTS OF THE NATIONAL TRAILS SYSTEM

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today, by request, legislation to establish the California and Pony Express National Historic Trails. Public Law 98-405, approved August 28, 1984, provided for the study of the California and Pony Express Trail routes to determine if these routes should be designated as components of the National Trail System. The legislation I am introducing today, at the request of the administration, would include these trails in the National Trail System as national historic trails.

I ask unanimous consent that the draft bill, the letter of transmittal, and the section-by-section analysis prepared by the administration appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 456

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(a) of the National Trails System Act (16 U.S.C. 1244(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraphs at the end thereof:

"( ) The California National Historic Trail, a route of approximately 5,700 miles, including all routes and cutoffs, extending from Independence and St. Joseph, Missouri, and Council Bluffs, Iowa, to various points in California and Oregon, as generally described in the report of the Department of the Interior prepared pursuant to subsection (b) of this section entitled 'California and Pony Express Trails, Eligibility/Feasibility Study/Environmental Assessment and dated September 1987. A map generally depicting the route shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no lands or interests in lands may be acquired for purposes of the trail designated under this paragraph without the consent of the owner thereof. The trail shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior.

"( ) The Pony Express National Historic Trail, a route of approximately 1,900 miles, including the original route and subsequent route changes, extending from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Sacramento, California, as generally described in the report of the Department of the Interior prepared pursuant to subsection (b) of this section entitled 'California and Pony Express Trails, Eligibility/Feasibility Study/Environmental Assessment' and dated September 1987. A map generally depicting the route shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no lands or interests in lands may be acquired for purposes of the trail designated under this paragraph without the consent of the owner thereof. The trail shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. Section 10(c)(2) of the National Trails System Act (16 U.S.C. 1249(c)(2)) is amended by adding "and ( ) and ( )" after "(16)".

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, DC, January 30, 1989.

Hon. J. DANFORTH QUAYLE,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to provisions of the National Trails System Act, Public Law 90-543, as amended (82 Stat. 919; 16 U.S.C. 1241), I am herewith submitting the study report on the California and Pony Express Trails in California, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Wyoming. Public Law 98-405, approved August 28, 1984, in amending the National Trails System Act, authorized study of the California and Pony Express Trail routes to determine if it would be feasible and desirable to designate them as components of the National Trails System. Conduct and completion of the studies and preparation of the study report were led by the National Park Service with the cooperation of the affected States, other Federal agencies, local governments, and the public.

Under provisions of section 5(b)(3) of the National Trails System Act, the National Park System Advisory Board is required to make recommendations as to the national historic significance of proposed national historic trails based on criteria developed under the Historic Sites Act of 1935 (49 Stat. 666; 16 U.S.C. 461). Pursuant to the August 11, 1987, letter of the Chairman of the Board, the board found that the California and Pony Express Trails are of national significance and are eligible for addition to the National Trails System as national historic trails.

Accordingly, I am submitting the study report as provided for in section 5(b) of the National Trails System Act for printing as a House or Senate document with the recommendation that the proposed California and Pony Express Trails are suitable for designation by the Congress as national historic trails. Enclosed is a draft of a bill which, if enacted, would designate the trails. A section-by-section analysis is also enclosed. We recommend that the bill be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration, and we recommend its enactment.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the enactment of the proposed legislation from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

EARL GJELDE,
Acting Secretary.

Enclosures.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. Amends section 5(a) of the National Trails System Act to designate two new national historic trails by adding two new unnumbered paragraphs which designate the 5,700-mile California National Historic Trail and the 1,900-mile Pony Express National Historic Trail, respectively, as components of the National Trails System. Trail routes are as generally described in the study report prepared by the Secretary of the Interior on the California and Pony Express Trails dated September 1987. Both trails are to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. Section 5(d) of the National Trails System Act requires the Secretary to establish an advisory council for each trail within one year of its addition to the system and section 5(f) requires the Secretary to submit a comprehensive plan for management and use of each trail to the legislative Committees of Congress within two complete fiscal years of enactment of legislation designating the trail.

Section 2. Amends section 10(c)(2) of the Act. That section authorizes appropriations to implement provisions of the Act with respect to the trails designated in paragraphs (9) through (13), and the trails designated in paragraphs (15) and (16), of section 5(a) as components of the National System.

Public Law 99-445, approved October 6, 1986, designated the Nez Perce National Historic Trail as paragraph (14), but it did not authorize appropriations without monetary limitation by amending section 10(c) to change the reference from paragraphs (9) through (13) to paragraph (9) through (14). Instead, Public Law 99-445 enacted a free-standing provision authorizing the appropriation of $550,000 to carry out the Nez Perce Trail designation.

Public Law 100-35, approved May 8, 1987, designated the Santa Fe National Historic Trail as paragraph (15), and amended section 10(c) of the Act to authorize appropriations for the trail designated by paragraph (15). Public Law 100-192, approved December 16, 1987, added the Trail of Tears as paragraph (16).

The amendment in section 2 adds a reference to the unnumbered paragraphs designating the California and Pony Express National Historic Trails in this bill, thereby authorizing appropriations for these two trails without monetary limitation.●

By Mr. DODD (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. 457. A bill to provide for demonstration projects for the improvement of childcare, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NEW SCHOOL CHILDCARE DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS ACT

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to encourage the development of a quality child care system within the Nation's public schools. I am pleased to have my distinguished colleagues from Minnesota, Senator DURENBERGER, from Michigan, Senator RIEGLE, and from New Mexico, Senator BINGAMAN, join me as sponsors of the "New School Child Care Demonstration Projects Act of 1989."

I believe that all of my colleagues recognize that American families need help balancing their family and workplace responsibilities and that the Federal Government has a strategic role to play. We are no longer debating whether or not child care legislation is necessary but rather what form that legislation should take.

Any legislation that we pass must improve the quality of child care, as well as its availability and affordability. Last month, as I conducted a hearing on the Act for Better Child Care, S. 5, I heard once again about the problems that working parents face in trying to find affordable and good quality child care. Three parents told tragic stories that are the worst nightmare of any family: of one child severely injured and two others dead as a result of abuse by their child care providers. These are extreme and, thankfully, rare cases. However, far too many parents are unable to find child care where they can leave their children without serious concern for their safety.

In order to prevent the tragedies experienced by those families and to address the skyrocketing demand for quality, affordable child care, last month I introduced S. 5, the Act for Better Child Services. That legislation would authorize significant Federal support for a wide range of child care services, from training for workers, to loans for providers, to child care subsidies for some 1 million children from low-income, working families.

The legislation I am introducing today complements S. 5 through the creation of model programs to point the way toward the good quality child care that our Nation's families deserve. The New School Child Care Demonstration Act of 1989 would establish a model child care system within the public schools. Each demonstration project would include: first, onsite child care for children from the ages of 3 to at least 12; second, a family support system for parents of newborn infants, including a home visitation program; third, support for local family day care providers, including training, technical assistance, and backup support in case of illness; and fourth, information and referral and other specialized services. All such services for children would be provided on a sliding fee cable, based upon the parents' ability to pay.

This bill authorizes $120 million, allowing each State to carry out one or more new school demonstration projects. Grants would also be available for demonstration projects focusing on special problems, including inner city and rural schools in poverty areas and schools serving a high proportion of single parent families and the young children of adolescent parents.

Under the New School Demonstration Projects Act of 1989, schools would be able to contract with nonprofit, community-based organizations to provide child care services. Likewise, every State would have an advisory committee, with members representing community-based child care organizations; parents' groups; teachers' groups; organizations serving as advocates on behalf of minority and handicapped children; State and local agencies providing education, social, health, and income maintenance services to children and families; individuals with expertise in early childhood development; and those representing private employers.

In addition to meeting State and local regulatory standards, each demonstration project must develop ways to improve the quality of child care services provided. One way to assure quality services is to improve the skills, performance, and salaries of child care workers. Therefore, the project administrators and staff must be trained in early childhood development. Likewise, salaries for workers should not be less than those paid for comparable services provided in the schools or surrounding community, whichever is higher. And last but not least, each project must provide for ongoing parental involvement throughout the process of planning, implementation, monitoring, and evaluation.

In closing, Mr. President, this legislation was inspired by the work of Dr. Edward Zigler, who I am proud to say is a constituent in my State of Connecticut. The director of the Bush Center in child development and social policy at Yale University, Dr. Zigler has been working on the issue of child care for some 30 years. He sees the prospect of putting child care services in the public schools as a means of building a family support and child care system within communities that is high quality, affordable, and universally accessible.

I urge my colleagues to join us in sponsoring the New School Child Care Demonstration Projects Act of 1989. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 457

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE AND TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "New School Childcare Demonstration Projects Act of 1989".

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS—

Sec. 1. Short title and table of contents.
Sec. 2. Findings and purpose.

Sec. 3. Definitions.
Sec. 4. State demonstration grants authorization.
Sec. 5. Allotments.
Sec. 6. Evaluation.
Sec. 7. Application.
Sec. 8. Secretarial demonstration projects.
Sec. 9. Payments.
Sec. 10. Authorization of appropriations.

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) dramatic changes in the demographics of the American workforce over the past two decades have had a profound effect on children and families;

(2) women and men are in the workforce out of economic necessity such that two out of every three women working outside of the home now provide the sole support or critical economic support for their families;

(3) twenty-six million children, close to half of all American children, have either a mother or both mother and father in the workforce and such numbers are expected to increase;

(4) Federal, State, and local policies have not kept pace with these changing demographics and the accompanying demand for quality, affordable childcare;

(5) there is a critical shortage of quality childcare arrangements for the children of working parents, from infancy through adolescence;

(6) even by conservative estimates, some two million elementary school age children lack adult supervision after school;

(7) quality after school care for the school age children of working parents has been shown to reduce the risk of delinquency, teenage pregnancy, injury, abuse, and poor school performance;

(8) research has also demonstrated that the most important variable in determining the effect of childcare on preschoolers is the quality of that care;

(9) a quality childcare system must address:

(A) the inability of some parents to pay for such services;

(B) the lack of training opportunities and low wages accorded childcare workers and their corresponding high rate of turnover;

(C) the often inadequate childcare standards and enforcement policies among the States; and

(D) the need for a strong partnership between childcare providers and parents; and

(10) building a quality childcare system within the public school system can help optimize the development of every American child and thus promote the future development and security of this Nation.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) provide financial assistance to States for the establishment of childcare demonstration projects within existing public elementary and secondary school buildings, that include the provision of—

(A) on-site childcare for children ages 3 to 12;

(B) a family support system for parents of newborn infants;

(C) support for local family daycare providers; and

(D) information and referral and other specialized services; and

(2) demonstrate the effectiveness of such demonstration projects in promoting community resources that provide high quality, affordable, and universally accessible family support and childcare services.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act:

(1) ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.—The term "elementary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(2) SECONDARY SCHOOL.—The term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(3) FAMILY SUPPORT SERVICES.—The term "family support services" means services that assist parents by providing support in parenting and by linking parents with community resources and with other parents.

(4) SECRETARY.—The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

(5) STATE.—The term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

SEC. 4. STATE DEMONSTRATION GRANTS AUTHORIZATION.

The Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to make grants to States to pay the Federal share of the cost of childcare demonstration projects conducted in existing public elementary and secondary school buildings.

SEC. 5. ALLOTMENTS.

(a) RESERVATION.—Of the amounts available for each of the fiscal years 1989 through 1991 under section 10, the Secretary shall—

(1) reserve 5 percent in each fiscal year to carry out section 6; and

(2) reserve $5,000,000 in each fiscal year to carry out section 8.

(b) STATE ALLOTMENT.—From the remainder of the sums appropriated under section 10 for grants to States for each fiscal year, the Secretary shall allot to each State, an amount which bears the same ratio to such remainder as the number of individuals in such State who have not attained 16 years of age bears to the total number of such children in all States, except that—

(1) each State shall be allotted not less than one-half of one percent of the amounts available for grants under section 9 for the fiscal year for which the allotment is made, or $500,000, whichever is the greater; and

(2) Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands shall each be allotted not less than one-eighth of 1 percent of the amounts available for grants under section 4 for the fiscal year for which the allotment is made.

(c) DEFINITION.—For the purpose of the exception contained in subsection (b)(1), the term "State" does not include Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(d) RECENT DATA REQUIRED.—For the purpose of this section, the Secretary shall use the most recent data available.

(e) ADJUSTMENTS.—

(1) RATABLE REDUCTIONS.—If the sums appropriated under section 10 for any fiscal year for grants to States authorized under section 4 are not sufficient to pay in full the total amounts which all States are entitled to receive under such section for such fiscal year, then the minimum amounts which all States are entitled to receive under such section for such fiscal year shall be ratably reduced.

(2) INCREASES.—In the event that additional funds become available for making such grants for any fiscal year during which the preceding sentence is applicable, such reduced amounts shall be increased on the same basis as they were reduced.

(f) REALLOTMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—If, at the end of the sixth month of any fiscal year for which sums are appropriated under section 10, the amount allotted to a State has not been made available to such State in grants under section 4 because of the failure of such State to meet the requirements for a grant, then the Secretary shall reallot such amounts to States which meet such requirements.

(2) AVAILABILITY FOR EXPENDITURE.—Funds made available by the Secretary through reallotment under paragraph (1) shall remain available for expenditure until the end of the fiscal year following the fiscal year in which such funds become available for reallotment.

SEC. 6. EVALUATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—From the amount reserved in each fiscal year under section 5(a)(1), the Secretary shall carry out the evaluation of the State and Federal demonstration projects.

(2) ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY.—The Secretary shall provide, through grants or contracts, for the continuing evaluation of the demonstration projects, including evaluations that measure and evaluate the impact of the projects, in order to determine—

(A) the effectiveness of such projects in achieving stated goals; and

(B) the impact of such projects on related programs including the impact on salaries paid to childcare workers in the community served, and the structure and mechanisms for delivery of childcare services, including, where appropriate, comparisons with appropriate control groups composed of persons who have not participated in such programs.

Evaluations shall be conducted by persons not directly involved in the administration of the project operation.

(b) RULES FOR CONDUCTING EVALUATIONS.—

(1) INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION INVOLVEMENT.—In carrying out evaluations under this section, the Secretary shall establish working relationships with the faculties of institutions of higher education located in the area in which any such evaluation is being conducted, unless there is no such institution willing and able to participate in the evaluation. For purposes of the preceding sentence, for any single evaluation area in which such working relationships are established may not be larger than 3 contiguous States.

(2) SPECIFIC VIEWS.—In carrying out evaluations under this section, the Secretary shall, whenever feasible, arrange to obtain the specific views of individuals participating in and served by programs and projects assisted under this Act about such programs and projects.

(3) PROPERTY OWNERSHIP.—The Secretary shall take the necessary action to assure that all studies, evaluations, proposals, and data produced or developed with assistance under this section shall become the property of the United States.

(c) RESULTS OF EVALUATIONS.—The Secretary shall publish the result of evaluative research and summaries of evaluations of program and project impact and effectiveness not later than 90 days after the completion thereof. The Secretary shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress copies of all such research studies and evaluation summaries.

SEC. 7. APPLICATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—No demonstration grant may be made under this section unless the chief executive officer of the State seeking such grant submits an application to the Secretary at such time and in such manner as the Secretary may reasonably require.

(b) REQUIREMENTS.—An application submitted under subsection (a) shall—

(1) specify the appropriate State agency or interagency council to be designated as the lead agency responsible for the administration of programs and activities relating to childcare programs carried out by the State under this Act and for coordination of related programs within the State;

(2) provide for an Advisory Committee which meets the requirements of subsection (c), to be appointed by the Chief Executive of the State to advise and consult in the preparation of the application, monitoring, and evaluation of demonstration projects assisted under this Act;

(3) provide comprehensive plans for one or more childcare demonstration projects within existing public school buildings that—

(A) ensure that year round, on-site, all day childcare for children ages 3 to 5 (or of the age of entering kindergarten) and on-site before and after school childcare for children ages 5 through 12, inclusive;

(B) ensure the establishment of a family support system for parents (including a home visitation program);

(C) provide support for local family daycare providers (including technical assistance, back-up support in case of illness, and training);

(D) provide for information and referral and other specialized services;

(E) develop a sliding scale fee payment system for children using the system (based on the parents ability to pay);

(F) provide for ongoing parental involvement in the planning, implementation, monitoring, and evaluation of such projects;

(G) provide that such demonstration projects be operated by administrators trained in early childhood development;

(H) provide for the use of trained childcare workers in such demonstration projects, with a priority given to childcare workers with credentials in early childhood education or child development, including the child development associate credential;

(I) provide that salaries paid to childcare workers in such demonstration projects shall—

(i) be not less than the rates paid for comparable services provided in the school or surrounding community, whichever is higher; and

(ii) be comparable to salaries paid to school employees with equivalent responsibilities, experience and credentials; and that salary schedules for childcare workers encourage childcare workers to obtain early childhood credentials;

(J) assure that any childcare services provided by such demonstration projects meet, at a minimum, regulatory standards set by the State and local government;

(K) develop ways to improve the quality of childcare services in such demonstrations; and

(L) describe plans for monitoring and evaluating the effectiveness of such demonstration projects;

(4) ensure that funds provided under this Act, shall be distributed by the State in demonstration grants to local public agencies and nonprofit private organizations for programs and projects within such State;

(5) provide assurances, in furnishing childcare services in a public school building, that the State has or will enter into an agreement with the appropriate State or local educational agency, for—

(A) the use of facilities for the provision of before or after school childcare services (including such use during holidays and vacation periods),

(B) the restrictions, if any, on the use of the space, and

(C) the times when the space will be available for the use of the applicant;

(6) provide that the State shall not use more than 5 percent of the funds provided in any fiscal year for administrative costs;

(7) provide assurances that the State will pay the non-Federal share of the activities for which assistance is sought from non-Federal sources;

(8) assure an equitable distribution of grants and grant funds within the State and between urban and rural areas within such State;

(9) provide for replication; and

(10) meet such other requirements as the Secretary reasonably determines are necessary to carry out the purposes and provisions of this Act.

(c) ADVISORY COMMITTEE RULES.—

(1) REPRESENTATION REQUIRED.—The Advisory Committee shall include, at a minimum—

(A) individuals representing community-based childcare organizations;

(B) individuals having expertise in early childhood development;

(C) individuals representing parents' groups and organizations;

(D) individuals representing teachers' groups and organizations;

(E) individuals representing State and local agencies which provide education, social, health, and income maintenance services for children and their families;

(F) individuals representing groups or organizations which advocate on behalf of children, minorities, and the handicapped; and

(G) individuals representing private employers who provide childcare services for their employees.

(2) SAVINGS PROVISION.—Any Advisory Committee in a State in existence on the date of enactment of this Act which the Secretary determines substantially meets the requirements of paragraph (1) shall constitute compliance with this section.

(d) APPROVAL.—The Secretary shall approve any application that meets the requirements of subsection (b), and the Secretary shall not disapprove any such application except after reasonable notice of the intention of the Secretary to disapprove of such, and after opportunity for correction of any deficiency.

SEC. 8. SECRETARIAL DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amounts reserved under section 5(a) shall be used for the provision of grants to public and nonprofit private entities for special demonstration projects to be awarded at the discretion of the Secretary.

(b) FOCUS OF PROJECTS.—The Secretary shall make grants under subsection (a) that take into consideration special problem areas such as—

(1) handicapped children;

(2) inner city schools in poverty areas;

(3) rural schools in poverty areas;

(4) schools with a high mix of children of many different ethnic backgrounds and native languages;

(5) schools with a high proportion of homeless children;

(6) schools serving the young children of adolescent parents and single-parent families; and

(7) schools where a high proportion of students are at risk of dropping out before completing junior high school.

SEC. 9. PAYMENTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall pay to each eligible State having an application approved under section 7 the Federal share of the cost of the activities described in the application.

(b) FEDERAL SHARE.—The Federal share for each fiscal year shall be 90 percent.

(c) NON-FEDERAL PAYMENTS.—The non-Federal share of payments under this Act may be in cash or in kind fairly evaluated, including planned equipment or services.

SEC. 10. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

To carry out the provisions of this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated $120,000,000 for the fiscal year 1989, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990 and 1991.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. SIMON, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. WIRTH, and Mr. KERRY):

S. 458. A bill to provide for a General Accounting Office investigation and report on conditions of displaced Salvadorans and Nicaraguans, to provide certain rules of the House of Representatives and of the Senate with respect to review of the report, to provide for the temporary stay of detention and deportation of certain Salvadorans and Nicaraguans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON CONDITIONS OF DISPLACED SALVADORANS AND NICARAGUANS

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I reintroduce legislation to suspend for 2 years the deportation of Salvadoran and Nicaraguan nationals from the United States. This legislation, popularly known as DeConcini-Moakley, will ensure that those seeking refuge in America are given a fair hearing instead of being turned away from America to face an unknown fate.

Recent events in El Salvador underscore the importance of thoroughly examining our deportation policy before we return displaced persons to that war-torn country. The upcoming election in El Salvador has caused an escalation of the violence and killing that have long plagued that country. President Duarte's terminal cancer has weakened his Christian Democratic Party. The conservative party, ARENA, has stepped into the vacuum and experts believe it has a good chance of winning this year's Presidential election. In addition, the FMLN's activities, both political and terrorist, have increased dramatically recently.

Many of the 70,000 casualties in El Salvador's civil war were civilians killed by the army or by right-wing death squads. Although often the perpetrators of these crimes are known, they are never brought to justice. We must temporarily postpone the deportation of Salvadorans to insure that they do not become victims of the random or directed violence that has once again become a daily hazard in El Salvador.

I urge the Bush administration to eliminate the need for legislation by granting the Salvadorans extended voluntary departure [EVD] status. The President has the power to grant EVD status without legislation. Currently, nationals from Afghanistan and Ethiopia enjoy EVD status. If we ignore our Central American neighbors in their time of need, it will further weaken our leadership role on this continent.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration has shown the same insensitivity toward these displaced persons from El Salvador as the previous administration. In fact, the administration has further restricted the rights of Central Americans with its new policy of detaining asylum applicants until their asylum claims are heard. Thus it appears that Congress will have to act to change the misguided deportation of Central Americans.

Over the last 8 years I have actively pressed for legislation that would protect the safety of displaced persons from El Salvador. I visited El Salvador several times and spoke with the leaders of that country. I remain in contact with El Salvador's Ambassador to the United States. I have visited with Alfredo Cristiani, the ARENA candidate for President. While he has renounced the death squad activity that was formerly associated with ARENA, we cannot be certain that there remains no connection. I remain firmly convinced that if the nationals are returned it will be at great risk to their safety, and it would have a disastrous effect on El Salvador's economy. Last September, President Duarte wrote a letter to Congress asking it to support DeConcini-Moakley. In that letter President Durate said that granting "temporary safe haven" to the Salvadorans was "the single most important initiative the United States can take to help my nation achieve peace."

The DeConcini-Moakley bill does not drastically alter immigration policy. Instead, it is a temporary offer of safe haven for those who have fled these two war-torn countries. It outlines what the GAO must investigate, and sets a definite timeframe for resolution of the covered individual's status. Because the bill provides only a temporary stay of deportation proceedings, it does not make any individual a permanent resident alien. The GAO has 1 year to complete its study and report its findings to Congress. The report is then referred to the appropriate congressional committee for hearings. Within 9 months the committee must report to the respective House its findings and any appropriate legislation.

The GAO study will cover three broad areas: displaced Salvadorans and Nicaraguans in Central America, treatment of those who are returned to El Salvador and Nicaragua, and the status of Salvadorans and Nicaraguans living in America. The study will focus on the safety problems these people face and the role the United States can play in resolving their problems.

A final important feature of this legislation is that it has a cut-off date for covered persons. Individuals are only eligible for a temporary stay of their deportation proceedings if they arrived in the United States before January 1, 1989. This provision ensures that the bill will not cause a drastic increase in the influx of Salvadorans and Nicaraguans.

Representative MOAKLEY has introduced similar legislation, H.R. 45, in the House of Representatives this term. I am confident his bill will pass the House, as it did last term by a margin of 237 to 181. DeConcini-Moakley passed the Senate Judiciary Committee by a 9 to 3 margin last term, so I anticipate that it will receive favorable action by that committee and soon be brought to the floor of the Senate for a vote.

With the resurgence of the violence and death in El Salvador, this legislation takes on greater urgency. A delay in its passage can be counted not only in days lost, but in lives lost. The new INS policy of detaining Central American asylum applicants until their asylum claims are processed suggests a departure from the favorable treatment that Nicaraguans received at the end of the Reagan administration. Therefore, Congress must act to halt the deportation of these threatened and vulnerable people from the United States.

Passage of DeConcini-Moakley will give the United States time to assess the security of these displaced persons and make a judgment based on all of the facts. Surely this is better than hasty judgments and wasted lives.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 458

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE INVESTIGATION AND REPORT INVESTIGATION

SEC. 101. (a) REQUIRING GAO INVESTIGATION ON DISPLACED SALVADORANS AND NICARAGUANS.—Within sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General of the United States shall begin an investigation concerning displaced nationals of El Salvador and Nicaragua.

(b) DETERMINATIONS ON DISPLACED SALVADORANS AND NICARAGUANS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.—The investigation shall determine the following with respect to displaced Salvadorans and displaced Nicaraguans who are present in either El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, or Nicaragua, regardless of whether or not they are registered:

(1) The number of these displaced persons and their current locations.

(2) Their place of origin in El Salvador or Nicaragua (as the case may be) and the period of, and reason for, their displacement.

(3) Their current living conditions, with particular attention to (A) their personal safety and the personal safety of those providing assistance to them, and (B) the availability of food and medical assistance.

(c) DETERMINATIONS ON CONDITIONS IN EL SALVADOR THAT COULD AFFECT SALVADORANS WHO HAVE RETURNED FROM THE UNITED STATES.—The investigation shall—

(1) assess the general conditions and circumstances in El Salvador that may affect returned nationals, with particular attention to determining the reliability and use of (A) reports of any violations of fundamental human rights, and (B) reports concerning the status of Salvadorans who have returned from the United States; and

(2) make recommendations for improvements in the type of information provided by such reports.

(d) DETERMINATIONS ON SALVADORANS SEEKING REFUGE IN OTHER COUNTRIES.—The investigation shall describe the policies of all other countries in which Salvadorans have sought refuge as these policies concern the return of the Salvadorans to El Salvador.

REPORT

SEC. 102. The Comptroller General of the United States shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, not later than one year after the date of the initiation of the study under section 101, a report on that study, including detailed findings on the items described in subsections (b), (c), and (d) of that section.

TITLE II—CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW REFERRAL OF REPORT, COMMITTEE HEARINGS, AND COMMITTEE REPORT

SEC. 201. (a) REFERRAL.—The report, when submitted under section 102, shall be referred, in accordance with the rules of each House, to the standing committee or committees of each House of Congress having jurisdiction over the subjects of the report, and the report shall be printed as a document of the House of Representatives.

(b) COMMITTEE HEARINGS.—Not later than 90 days of continuous session of Congress after the date of the referral of the report to a committee, the committee shall initiate hearings, insofar as such committee has legislative or oversight jurisdiction, to consider—

(1) the findings of the report,

(2) the appropriate steps that should be taken to provide assurances of personal safety and adequate, efficient, and equitable distribution of assistance with respect to Salvadorans or Nicaraguans who are displaced within El Salvador or Nicaragua (as the case may be) or who have fled to other countries in Central America,

(3) treaty obligations of the United States, humanitarian considerations, and previous practice of the United States respecting the treatment of aliens in similar circumstances, and

(4) whether it is appropriate to extend, remove, or alter the restrictions contained in title III.

(c) COMMITTEE REPORT.—Not later than 270 days of continuous session of the Congress after the date of the referral of the report to a committee, the committee shall report to its respective House its oversight findings and any legislation it deems appropriate.

(d) TREATMENT OF CONTINUITY OF SESSION.—For purposes of this Act, continuity of session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die at the end of the second regular session of a Congress, and days on which either House of Congress is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 10 days to a date certain are excluded from the computation of the periods of continuous session of Congress.

TITLE III—TEMPORARY STAY OF DEPORTATION LIMITATION ON DETENTION AND DEPORTATION

SEC. 301. (a) LIMITATION.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall not detain or deport (to El Salvador or Nicaragua, as the case may be) aliens described in subsection (b) during the period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act and ending 270 days of continuous session of Congress after the date of transmittal of the report of the Comptroller General of the United States to the Speaker of the House of Representatives under section 102.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not be construed to prohibit the brief interrogation of an alien under section 287(a)(1) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1357(a)(1)) for the purpose of determining whether this section applies to particular aliens.

(b) SALVADORANS AND NICARAGUANS COVERED BY THE LIMITATION.—The nationals referred to in subsection (a)(1) are aliens who—

(1) are nationals of El Salvador or Nicaragua,

(2) have been and are continuously present in the United States since before January 1, 1989, and

(3) are determined to be deportable only under—

(A) paragraph (1) of section 241(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)), but only as such paragraph relates to a ground for exclusion described in paragraph (14), (15), (20), (21), (25), or (32) of section 212(a) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)), or

(B) under paragraph (2), (9), or (10) of section 241(a) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1254(a)).

(c) REGISTRATION.—Each individual described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (b) shall register with the Attorney General anytime beginning 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act and ending 180 days after such date, as a person to whom this Act applies. Upon registering, an individual shall be granted employment authorization and shall be provided with an appropriate document which shall note on its face that the individual's employment authorization terminates at the end of the suspension of deportation period established under subsection (a) and shall indicate such date.

(d) No person who ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in the persecution of any person on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or public opinion may obtain the benefit described in subsection (a).

PERIOD OF STAY OF DEPORTATION NOT COUNTED TOWARD OBTAINING SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION BENEFIT

SEC. 302. With respect to an alien whose deportation is temporarily stayed under section 301 during a period, the period of the stay shall not be counted as a period of physical presence in the United States for purposes of section 244(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1254(a)), unless the Attorney General determines that extreme hardship exists.

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

ALIEN'S STATUS DURING PERIOD OF EXTENSION

SEC. 401. During the period in which an alien's deportation is temporarily stayed under section 301, the alien—

(1) shall not be considered to be permanently residing in the United States under color of law,

(2) shall not be eligible for any program of public assistance furnished (directly or through reimbursement) under Federal law, and

(3) may be deemed ineligible for public assistance by a State (as defined in section 101(a)(36) of the Immigration and Nationality Act) or any political subdivision thereof which furnishes such assistance.●

By Mr. GORE (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. KERRY, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 459. A bill to amend title 35, United States Code, and the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, with respect to the use of inventions in outer space; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

USE OF INVENTIONS IN SPACE

● GORE. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce legislation that will help establish the patent regime for inventions made in outer space.

I also am pleased to announce that Senators HOLLINGS, KERRY, ROCKEFELLER, KASSEBAUM, BENTSEN, AND INOUYE have agreed to cosponsor this measure.

Mr. President, for the last few Congresses patent legislation for space-based activities has been introduced, but it has not fared very well in the U.S. Senate. Quite frankly, until now there really did not appear to be a need for such legislation, so it was hard to get the proposed legislation considered.

This year that situation is totally different!

When the United States signed the Space Station Intergovernmental Agreements last September with the European Space Agency, Canada and Japan, a very real need for patent legislation surfaced. As a matter of fact, enactment of such legislation is required for the United States to put the Intergovernmental Agreements into effect. Specifically, what is needed is language that permits an exception to the strict application of U.S. patent law for space vehicles that are specifically identified in an international agreement to which the United States is a party. The IGA makes such an exception regarding the applicability of 35 U.S.C. 184 which concerns the filing of patent applications in foreign countries. In the IGA, the parties to the Space Station Agreements have agreed that their national laws (35 U.S.C. 184 for the United States) would not be applied to prevent or delay the filing of patent applications in other countries for inventions made on their registered elements by persons not their nationals or residents under certain specified conditions.

Mr. President, finally, I should note that the language of the proposed amendment being introduced today in the Senate is identical to that which was passed twice by the House of Representatives and which has received substantial support from private industry and the private patent bar.

Mr. President, based on discussions that took place at the end of the last Congress with the Senate Judiciary Committee, I understand that the Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights and Trademarks has agreed to consider this legislation in a timely manner during the 101st Congress. I support this position and want to thank the chairman of that subcommittee, my good friend and the senior Senator from Arizona, for his willingness to address this issue and to facilitate implementation of the space station agreements.

Mr. President, it is becoming clearer that the dreams of yesterday are becoming the realities of today. Space is the next frontier, and the United States must be in a position to avail itself of these new markets. Passage of this bill in a timely manner is a small step in that direction, but it's an important step because U.S. firms must have an acceptable legal regime in which to operate.

Mr. President, I hope this bill can be enacted in a timely manner by this Congress so that we can get on with the challenges of space-based activities and so that working in space one day will be as commonplace as working on Earth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 459

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1)

chapter 10 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 105. Inventions in outer space

Any invention made, used or sold in outer space on an aeronautical and space vehicle (as defined in section 103(2)) of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 (42 U.S.C. 2452(2)) under the jurisdiction or control of the United States shall be considered to be made, used or sold within the United States for purposes of this title, except with respect to any space vehicle or component thereof that is specifically identified and otherwise provided for by an international agreement to which the United States is a party.".

(2) The table of sections of chapter 10 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"105. Inventions in outer space.".

(b) Section 305 of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 (42 U.S.C. 2457) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(m) Any invention made, used or sold in outer space on an aeronautical and space vehicle (as defined in section 103(2)) under the jurisdiction or control of the United States shall be considered to be made, used or sold within the United States for purposes of this Act, except with respect to any space vehicle or component thereof that is specifically identified and otherwise provided for by an international agreement to which the United States is a party.".

SEC. 2. (a) Subject to subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section, the amendments made by the first section of this Act shall apply to all United States patents granted before, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act, and to all applications for United States patents pending on or filed on or after such date of enactment.

(b) The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall not affect any final decision made by a court or the Patent and Trademark Office before the date of enactment of this Act with respect to a patent or an application for a patent, if no appeal from such decision is pending and the time for filing an appeal has expired.

(c) The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall not affect the right of any party in any case pending in a court on the date of enactment of this Act to have the party's rights determined on the basis of the substantive law in effect before such date of enactment.

(d) Subject to subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the amendments made by the first section of this Act shall not apply to any process, machine, article or manufacture, or composition of matter, an embodiment of which was launched prior to the date of enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I join the distinguished Senator from Tennessee in introducing the space patent bill, and I too hope that the Congress can act on this measure in a timely manner so as to add an element of certainty to the risky business of space-based activities.

Mr. President, this is important and necessary legislation because it would remedy the current uncertainty for patent law purposes as to the jurisdiction that applies to activities in outer space. This problem arises primarily because, as a general proposition, the existing patent laws of most countries, including the United States, have no extraterritorial effect. The bill would specifically provide that the U.S. patent law applies with respect to inventions made, used, or sold in space which are on aeronautical and space vehicles under the jurisdiction or control of the United States. This is important in determining the priority of invention, rights to inventions made with U.S. Government funds, and enforcement of privately held patents against infringers.

The bill is consistent with the purpose of the U.S. patent laws, to promote progress in the useful arts, by recognizing and rewarding inventions that advance space technology, as well as the policy and purposes of the U.S. Space Program as set forth in the National Aeronautics and Space Act. One effect of this bill would be to provide the ability to treat the Space Transportation System, and eventually the U.S. portion of the space station, as U.S. facilities in the same manner as a terrestrial-based facility is currently treated in relation to inventions and patents under title 35. It would also apply to privately owned space vehicles.

With the enactment of this bill, U.S. commercial entities will know, with certainty, that their activities in space will receive the same patent protection that these activities receive if conducted on Earth. This certainty in the area of intellectual property law will provide a more conducive business environment and, therefore, encourage the private sector to invest in the commercial use of space.

Mr. President, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space and to ask for expedited consideration of this measure in the 101st Congress.●

By Mr. CONRAD:

S. 460. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to extend treatment of certain rents under section 2032A to all qualified heirs; to the Committee on Finance.

EXTENSION OF TREATMENT OF CERTAIN RENTS

● Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, the 1988 technical corrections law contained an important change in estate tax treatment that will enable more farm families to keep an ongoing farming operation in the family when the property owner dies.

Section 2032A, as amended by the technical correction, extends special use valuation of farm property to surviving spouses who continues to cash-rent farm property to their children. Without this change, a recapture tax would have been imposed in such situations. By allowing the spouse to qualify for special use valuation, the correction was clearly intended to allow a farmer to transmit farm land to his children who would then continue to farm the property.

The 1988 provision, which applies to cash rentals occurring after December 31, 1986, should be helpful, but it does not entirely solve the problem. If there is no surviving spouse, it is not possible under the new law to transmit such property to one's children or grandchildren without triggering the recapture tax.

Accordingly, today I am introducing legislation which would apply to such analogous cases. I learned, for example, of a North Dakota constituent who cash-rented farm property from his mother, who had received the property from her father. Although the deceased grandfather qualified for special use valuation, neither the daughter nor grandson would be able to under a provision that applies only to surviving spouses.

I do not believe such situations were widespread, and it seems likely that Congress did not anticipate them when the language on surviving spouses was agreed to last year. But these cases do exist, and I believe they deserve the same treatment under section 2032A. The bill I am introducing is narrowly drawn to apply to qualified heirs who are immediate members of the decedent's family. I urge my colleagues to consider the fairness of this change, and approve a further correction in this area.●

By Mr. Grassley (for himself and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 461. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to permit payment for services of physician assistants outside institutional settings; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE PAYMENTS FOR PHYSICIAN ASSISTANTS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which would extend Medicare reimbursement for services rendered by physicians' assistants in doctors' offices, clinics, and homes. Congressman RON WYDEN and I introduced this legislation last year. In the Senate, the bill was S. 1230, and was introduced May 19, 1987.

This bill complements legislation we introduced in 1986 which became law as part of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of that year. That legislation authorized Medicare part B reimbursement of the services of physician assistants under certain conditions. The services of the physician assistant had to be provided under the supervision of a physician. The services were to be rendered in a hospital, a skilled or intermediate care nursing facility, or for assistance at surgery. The services of the physician assistants were to be reimbursed at a discounted rate: 65 percent of the physician's charge for assistance at surgery, 75 percent for services provided in a hospital, and 85 percent for services provided in a nursing home. The reimbursement was to be paid to the supervising physician.

The reconciliation legislation for fiscal year 1988 included a provision which authorized Medicare part B reimbursement for all services of physician assistants rendered in rural health manpower shortage areas, regardless of the institutional setting in which they are delivered, and at 85 percent of the physicians' charge for the service.

The legislation I am introducing today would extend Medicare reimbursement to the services of physician assistants regardless of setting or geographic location.

Mr. President, according to a study by the Office of Technology Assessment, physician assistants can have a positive influence on the quality of health care and on access to services. I believe that physician assistants can be particularly helpful in increasing access to health care services in rural communities. I believe that this was recognized by the Congress in the 1988 reconciliation legislation when we decided to reimburse physician assistants in health manpower shortage areas.

The bill I am introducing today is a logical extension of the earlier legislation I described above, which facilitated a greater role for physician assistants.●

By Mr. EXON (for himself and Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. SIMON, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. KERRY, Mr. DODD, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. PELL, and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 462. A bill to amend the Rail Passenger Service Act to authorize appropriations for the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

AUTHORIZING APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL RAILROAD PASSENGER CORPORATION

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Surface Transportation Subcommittee, I take pleasure in introducing legislation to reauthorize our National Rail Passenger Corporation [Amtrak] for fiscal years 1989, 1990, 1991, and 1992. I am especially pleased to be joined by my distinguished colleagues, the ranking minority member of the Surface Transportation Subcommittee, Senator KASTEN, and the chairman of the Appropriations Transportation Subcommittee, Senator LAUTENBERG, along with a number of my colleagues from around the country, in introducing this bill.

The budget proposal submitted for fiscal year 1990 by both the previous administration and the new administration once again calls for the elimination of funding for Amtrak. Most of us who support a national passenger rail system are convinced that a total elimination of Federal funding for Amtrak would mean the obliteration of rail passenger service in this country.

So the issue here is whether we want national passenger rail service. I certainly do, and I believe that a majority of Americans also want to retain this transportation option. Over 21.5 million intercity passengers traveled by Amtrak last year, and an additional 14 million commuters rode on trains operated by Amtrak, so rail service is obviously an important link in our transportation network. Since 1981, passenger miles, often considered the best indicator ridership, increased over 19 percent and passenger miles per constant dollar of Federal subsidy increased over 250 percent. Passenger miles per train mile have increased 22 percent and for every mile traveled by an Amtrak train, an average of 189 passengers are aboard.

Amtrak is also making substantial progress in becoming increasingly self-sufficient. In fiscal year 1988, Amtrak covered over 69 percent of its total operating cost with its own revenue, as compared with 48 percent of its costs in fiscal year 1981. I am not aware of any passenger railroad in the world that covers more of its own costs than Amtrak.

Last year, Amtrak earned a record $1.1 billion in revenue which is a 14-percent improvement over fiscal year 1987 and an 81-percent increase since fiscal year 1981.

We must not lose sight of the role Amtrak plays in relieving the congestion on our highways and in the air. Amtrak also serves approximately 500 communities of which—114 have no air service, 98 have no direct intercity bus service, and 37 have neither air nor bus service.

Amtrak has been on a steady uphill climb since 1970. Number of passengers, miles traveled, and revenue-to-expenses have increased dramatically. Amtrak has shown some real innovation in increasing efficiency, but it can not stand alone. The reauthorization level for fiscal year 1989 in this legislation is based on the fiscal year 1988 authorization which was included in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, with the subsequent funding levels in the bill adjusted for projected inflation during this time.

I look forward to continued improvement in the Amtrak system, and pledge my commitment to working toward this end. I encourage my colleagues to join us in supporting our national rail passenger system.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 462

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 601(b)(2) of the Rail Passenger Service Act (45 U.S.C. 601(b)(2)) is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of subparagraph (D);

(2) by striking the period at the end of subparagraph (E) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(F) not to exceed $630,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989;

"(G) not to exceed $656,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990;

"(H) not to exceed $684,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1991; and

"(I) not to exceed $712,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1992.".

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Nebraska, Senator EXON, in introducing a bill to reauthorize our national passenger rail system, Amtrak.

As chairman of the Senate Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, as well as a Senator for a State dependent on passenger rail service, I have always been a strong supporter of Amtrak. It's an important element of our national transportation system.

Mr. President, on January 25, I introduced Senate Resolution 24, to express the sense of the Senate that Amtrak should continue to received adequate Federal support. I was pleased to be joined in introducing that resolution by Senator EXON and other Senators from virtually all regions of our country.

That geographical representation demonstrates that Amtrak is not a regional concern, not just something those of us in the Northeast Corridor care about. But certainly, for States like New Jersey, Amtrak is an absolute necessity. Thousands of our commuters depend on it everyday, riding to and from work on Amtrak trains or New Jersey Transit cars traveling over Amtrak rails. In our State and our region, our roads are clogged at rush hour. Without Amtrak's services, those roads would become parking lots.

But Amtrak is no less important in more rural States. In many cases, it's the only form of intercity public transportation available. Take away Amtrak, and you take away the ability of millions of rural Americans to travel in a timely, affordable manner.

Mr. President, over the last 8 years, we in the Congress fought the administration to keep Amtrak alive. Our efforts have been rewarded with improved financial performance, and record numbers of riders. The view of the Bush administration toward Amtrak remains to be seen. Secretary Skinner, throughout his confirmation process, acknowledged the importance of Amtrak. As someone who's been involved in transportation planning, he's seen it firsthand. His views and experience are encouraging.

However, it's likely that Mr. Skinner's views will be tempered by others in the administration more concerned with short-sighted ideologies than long-term needs. Congress likely will have to continue to fight to preserve Amtrak.

Mr. President, the bill we introduce today calls for increased funding levels for Amtrak. As chairman of the subcommittee responsible for funding Amtrak, I can say that meeting those goals will be difficult, if not impossible. But these are goals worth aiming for. In its report, "1989 U.S. Industrial Outlook," the U.S. Department of Commerce projected that Amtrak ridership could continue to grow by 4 to 5 percent annually through 1993. More significant growth, the report stated, would be hampered by capacity constraints.

Mr. President, the potential for further improvement at Amtrak is clear. To pull the rug out by denying Federal support, as was proposed by the Reagan administration, would be shortsighted and counterproductive. It would simply shift the burden of carrying passengers from Amtrak to other modes, which are already overburdened.

Again, Mr. President, I recognize that budgetary pressures will make it difficult to meet the authorization levels contained in this bill. But, as chairman of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, I am committed to continuing support for the system. I will continue to work with Amtrak president Graham Claytor to find ways of making Amtrak more efficient and less dependent on Federal funds.

Mr. President, I applaud Senator EXON for his leadership in introducing this bill, and look forward to Commerce Committee action on this important legislation.●

● Mr. SIMON, Mr. President I welcome this opportunity to join Senator EXON and my other colleagues in support of an improved national rail passenger system and I urge others to join us. In spite of the administration's repeated attempts to end Amtrak for the past 5 years, we in Congress have rejected this shortsighted proposal. Instead we have continued to provide money each year for its growing operations: long trains from East to West and North to South; between cities like Washington and New York, Chicago and Springfield, and San Diego and Los Angeles; and busy commuter systems like those in Massachusetts and Maryland.

Now we have a new administration and a new Secretary of Transportation, Samuel Skinner who has given us the assurance that the Department of Transportation will develop a comprehensive transportation policy. If that is so, an assessment of national rail needs and potential is long overdue.

Amtrak has been following the direction of Congress for the past 8 years—reduce reliance on Federal subsidies. Its shortfall on passenger operations has been reduced an impressive 43 percent, but, faces by hard choices on surface transportation programs, we have reduced Federal financial support by 53 percent in constant dollars. During this time Amtrak's major successes have occurred where the earlier investments have been substantial enough to make Amtrak an attractive choice to travelers. Amtrak's contribution to reduction of auto and airport congestion in the Northeast is so impressive that its successes must be maintained and expand in other parts of the Nation. Indeed, where it makes economic sense, Amtrak must meet the growing demand for its service.

In addition to shorter range service in congested urban regions, tourism is a major component of Amtrak's success. Travelers from here and abroad, instead of flying into the inevitable moonscapes around major airports, more often prefer Amtrak's long distance trains which originate in major cities, such as Chicago, and stop in many of the most attractive, historic rail towns in the Nation. That provides a potential reawakening of these towns as our major cities. Unfortunately, these long distance trains cannot keep up with this demand and are booked 4 months in advance during the peak season. Many customers are being turned away.

Because of Amtrak's success it can no longer coast on past investments in facilities and equipment. To raise more revenues Amtrak needs enough refurbished and new locomotives and railcars to meet its current demand and to avoid breakdowns due to shortage in equipment. Rights of way, if sufficiently improved at a fraction of the cost of new highway lanes or expanded airports, will provide for traveling speeds of up to 125 miles per hour.

In Illinois the major Amtrak route between Chicago and St. Louis stopping at our capitol, Springfield, is owned by a rail company now in receivership, and its potential is sorely hampered by poorly maintained track requiring slower speeds.

We can no longer accept shrinkage in the underused national rail system as inevitable while the demand for reliable and extensive rail travel expands. Congress must give a clear signal to citizens and their States and local governments as well as the private sector that Amtrak is not only here to stay, but that rail passenger service is an important option in their transportation and economic development plans. I urge you to join me in giving the Nation that green light.●

S. 464. A bill to promote safety and health in workplace owned, operated or under contract, with the United States by clarifying the U.S. obligation to observe occupational safety and health standards and clarifying the U.S. responsibility for harm caused by its negligence at any workplace owned by, operated by, or under contract with the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GOVERNMENT OBSERVATION OF SAFETY AND HEALTH STANDARDS

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, in December 1861, Abraham Lincoln said in his State of the Union Address:

> It is as much the duty of government to render prompt justice against itself in favor of citizens, as it is to administer the same between private individuals.

That simple statement captures an essential part of the essence of democracy. It says eloquently that no person and no institution is above the law, not even the Government itself. Yet, we have not totally heeded the wisdom and advice of President Lincoln. We continue even today, almost 130 years later, to see our Government invoke its sovereign immunity, the theory that the king, the monarch, the absolute ruler, can do no wrong.

I introduce today, along with Senator BOND of Missouri, a bill to help right that wrong, to put the scales of democratic justice in balance, and not weighted heavily on the side of the Government against its citizenry.

This bill is short and to the point: it says that the Government, like private employers, must observe occupational safety regulations in any workplace it owns, operates or has under contract and if it does not, that it can be sued for its negligence when injury occurs.

The bill is nothing more than a day in court bill. It is not a compensation bill. It is not an automatic entitlement. It does not declare an open season on the Treasury. By clarifying the obligation of the United States to observe occupational safety and health standards, it simply allows people who are injured when those standards are ignored or violated to sue the Government.

I think the passage of this legislation is a clear move, and an overdue one, toward justice and equity and away from a double standard which treats private employers much more harshly than it treats the Government. What we insist the private sector do to protect its workers in terms of following health and safety regulations, we must also require of Government. That is all this bill does.

It does another thing which makes sense under our system of law. It makes equal treatment of similar cases of injury part of our law by depriving the Government of a technical legal defense. Under present law, two individuals with the same grievance under the same circumstances are not treated before the law.

An injury caused by the negligence of a private person or a corporate employee can result in a lawsuit and a verdict that can be enforced if the negligent person is found liable. But, if the negligence results from the Government's negligence or from that of its employees, compensation is denied because of the technical defense of sovereign immunity, and its corollary, discretionary function.

What this means is that the same offense, the same unhealthy consequences, the same court finding and verdict, can lead to two different results for equivalent victims. Under current law, many people go uncompensated because of the Government appeal that it cannot be sued. That is not just and it is not what a democracy should guarantee its citizens.

To render prompt justice, as Lincoln suggested, means that citizens should be able to call their Government to task for negligence resulting in injury, as they do their fellow citizens. This bill provides for that equality of treatment and I look forward to its careful consideration and early passage.

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 465. A bill to amend the National Trails System Act by designating the Juan Bautista de Anza National Historic Trail, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

JUAN BAUTISTA DE ANZA NATIONAL HISTORIC TRAIL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to designate the Juan Bautista de Anza Trail as a component of the National Trails System. The bill is identical to legislation being introduced in the House by Congressman GEORGE MILLER.

In 1775, Juan Bautista de Anza, a second-generation frontier soldier, set forth from Horcasitas, Mexico to open up the first overland route to upper California. Crossing the border near the city of Nogales, the expedition followed a route north along the Santa Cruz River past Tucson, then westward along the Gila River to Yuma, and across the Colorado River back into Mexico. Reentering the United States near El Centro, the expedition continued northward through Imperial, San Diego, Riverside, Los Angeles, Ventura, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, Monterey, San Benito, Santa Clara, and San Mateo Counties, finally reaching San Francisco in June 1776. The de Anza expedition proved that overland travel between the Mexican province of Sonora and upper California was possible and resulted in the initial settlement of San Francisco and the founding of the presidio and mission there.

Pursuant to legislation I sponsored in the 98th Congress, the National Park Service conducted a feasibility study of including the Juan Bautista de Anza Trail in the National Trails System. I'm pleased to report that this feasibility study/environmental assessment concluded that the de Anza Trail meets the criteria for designation as a national historic trail. The study further found that there is substantial public support for the designation and that State and local agencies and private organizations are prepared to contribute their resources to the endeavor.

The bill I am introducing today implements the recommendations of the National Park Service study. It designates the Juan Bautista de Anza National Historic Trail, comprising approximately 1,200 miles from Nogales, AZ, to San Francisco, CA, and provides that the trail be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. The bill also calls for the Secretary to encourage the participation of volunteer trail organizations in the development and maintenance of the trail.

Mr. President, enactment of this legislation will give national recognition to an important pioneer route and commemorate an event significant to the course of American history and the settlement of California. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 465

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Juan Bautista de Anza National Historic Trail Act".

SEC. 2. JUAN BAUTISTA DE ANZA NATIONAL HISTORIC TRAIL.

(a) DESIGNATION.—Section 5(a) of the National Trails System Act (16 U.S.C. 1244(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(17) The Juan Bautista de Anza National Historic Trail, a trail comprising the overland route traveled by Captain Juan Bautista de Anza of Spain during the years 1775 and 1776 from Sonora, Mexico, to the vicinity of San Francisco, California, of approximately 1,200 miles through Arizona and California, as generally described in the report of the Department of the Interior prepared pursuant to subsection (b) entitled 'Juan Bautista de Anza National Trail Study, Feasibility Study and Environmental Assessment' and dated August 1986. A map generally depicting the trail shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Director of the National Park Service, Washington, District of Columbia. The trail shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. In implementing this paragraph, the Secretary shall encourage volunteer trail groups to participate in the development and maintenance of the trail.".

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 10(c)(2) of the National Trails System Act (16 U.S.C. 1249(c)) is amended by striking "and (16)" and inserting "(16), and (17)".

By Mr. BIDEN (for himself and Mr. THURMOND):

S. 466. A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to prohibit the use of the mails to sell or solicit the sale of anabolic steroids; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STEROIDS CONTROL

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, Today I am introducing a bill to address what has become a major public health problem in America—the abuse of anabolic steroids. And I am pleased to have the Senator from South Carolina join me in this effort. Senator THURMOND and I have been working for many years to deal with the drug abuse problem, particularly among our young people.

Young people use steroids not only because they want to be better athletes, but also because they want to look better. What they do not understand is that steroids have proven adverse medical consequences. The medical problems associated with steroids include coronary artery disease—including heart attack and stroke, cancer, liver disease, sterility, increased cholesterol levels, stunted growth in adolescents, and—in some rare cases—death. There is also some limited evidence that steroids can be psychologically addictive.

Unfortunately, while most people think that steroids are only a problem among the elite circle of world-class Olympic athletes, steroid abuse permeates every level of amateur and professional sports. In a recent survey, 7 percent of the male high school athletes said they had or were continuing to use steroids. And it's almost unbelievable that 40 percent of these users began before the age of 16. Applied nationwide, it could mean that 250,000 to 500,000 male high school students are using steroids.

Not surprisingly, this incredible demand for illicit steroids fuels an underground black market that has become a $400 to $500 million industry. And in an ominous trend, professional drug traffickers have been lured by these profits and are beginning to push a new set of poisons upon our children.

Last year, I added an amendment to the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 that increased the penalty for illegal distribution of steroids from a misdemeanor to a felony, punishable by up to 3 years imprisonment. And the penalty doubles for selling steroids to children.

When I introduced that amendment, I said that it was only the first step in what should be a nationwide crackdown on steroid trafficking and abuse. The bill that I am introducing today represents what I believe should be one of the next steps in this effort.

Many illegal steroids dealers use the U.S. mails to distribute these drugs throughout the country. In addition, some foreign companies in Mexico and Europe have used direct mail solicitations to encourage U.S. citizens to buy steroids. In one blatant example, a Mexican firm, United Pharmaceuticals of Mexico, mailed a solicitation to U.S. citizens giving them directions to a hotel across the border where they could go to buy steroids.

My bill would address these problems in two ways. First, it will make using the mails to distribute steroids a separate criminal offense, thus giving postal investigators the authority to conduct steroid investigations. And second, it will make the solicitation of illegal steroid sales through the mails or any other communication device such as the telephone a criminal offense. Any person who violates either of these provisions faces a prison sentence of up to 3 years.

Once again, I would like to thank Senator THURMOND for joining me in this effort. I look forward to working with him in the Judiciary Committee as we try to stem the steroid abuse problem in America.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 466

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after section 1716A the following:

"SEC. 1716B. NONMAILABLE ANABOLIC STEROIDS.—

"(a) Whoever knowingly—

"(1) deposits in the mail;

"(2) causes to be deposited in the mail; or

"(3) receives by mail with intent to further distribute, any anabolic steroid for any use in humans other than the treatment of disease pursuant to the order of a physician, except as otherwise permitted by law, shall be fined under this title, imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, the term "mail" means the U.S. Postal Service or any other interstate mailing or delivery facility or service.

"(c) Whoever knowingly uses any communication facility as defined in subsection (b) of section 403 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 843(b)) in committing or in causing or facilitating the commission of any act or acts prohibited by subsection (a) shall be fined under this title, imprisoned not more than three years, or both. Each separate use of a communication facility shall be a separate offense under this subsection.

"(d) Any property, real or personal, involved in a violation of subsection (a) or (c) shall be subject to forfeiture under the procedures provided in sections 413 and 511 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 853 or 881), with respect to criminal and civil forfeiture. Such forfeiture proceedings may be carried out by the Department of Justice or, with respect to administrative forfeiture proceedings, by the Postal Service.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the item for section 1716A the following:

"1716B. Nonmailable anabolic steriods.".

(c) Section 3001 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by inserting "1716B," after "1716,".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to join Senator BIDEN in introducing this important legislation. Last year, as part of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, legislation was enacted which prohibits the distribution of anabolic steroids for any use in humans, other than for medical treatment. This provision was in response to the growing abuse of anabolic steroids by young adults, bodybuilders, and athletes. Ignoring the proven side effects of steroid use, such as cancer and sterility, people have continued to use steroids in an effort to make themselves stronger and physically more attractive. With the strong demand for these steroids, there will always be those who attempt to profit from their sale.

Despite last year's enactment of the statute banning the distribution of steroids, many wholesale steroids dealers have been using the regular mails to distribute their drugs. In addition, steroid dealers from various parts of the world have been marketing their products in the United States through direct-mail and telephone solicitation.

This legislation builds upon the drug bill Congress passed last year by making it illegal to use the mails to distribute steroids. Those who violate this provision would be subject to a maximum of 3 years imprisonment and tough criminal fines. The bill also makes the solicitation of illegal steroids sales a criminal offense and provides for the forfeiture of those assets used to violate the statute. In effect, this bill will give U.S. Postal Inspectors the necessary jurisdiction to provide needed assistance to law enforcement in the battle against illegal steroid use.

Mr. President, the abuse of anabolic steroids is a serious problem facing this Nation. Everyday, people are using these drugs despite the risks to their health and even their life. We must not stand by and watch as thousands of our citizens ruin their lives for the sake of bigger and stronger bodies. Without question, those people who sell steroids in violation of the law are drug pushers. Legislation which will punish them for their efforts to distribute illegal drugs should be swiftly considered.

I look forward to hearings on this bill and I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

By Mr. SIMON (for himself and Mr. DIXON):

S. 467. A bill to provide for an accelerated implementation of an approved demonstration project for Federal Aviation Administration employees at certain facilities; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ACCELERATED IMPLEMENTATION OF AN APPROVED DEMONSTRATION PROJECT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today, my good friend and colleague Senator DIXON and I are introducing legislation which should significantly help address both the safety and traffic problems now faced by three of our busiest airports—Los Angeles, New York Kennedy, and Chicago O'Hare.

Several months ago, Senator DIXON, and I, and several of our colleagues in the other body, went through a series of meetings with the Federal Aviation Administration. A number of near air misses in the Chicago airspace had increased fears that there was a disaster waiting to happen.

One of the problems the FAA has faced at O'Hare, and other large airports, is the ability to attract qualified controllers and, over time, to retain them. While this is only one of many problems we fact at O'Hare, it is a critical problem. The FAA has responded by asking the Office of Personnel Management to use their authority to put a pay demonstration project into place at three of the country's largest airports. The pay demonstration project, authorized under civil service reform legislation in 1976, will allow 2,000 FAA employees to be eligible to receive an additional pay allowance of up to 20 percent of their basic pay. The demonstration project will last for 5 years. Other pay demonstration projects already initiated by the Office of Personnel Management have proven to be highly effective management tools. We anticipate that this project will do the same at O'Hare, Kennedy, and Los Angeles International Airport.

Under the pay demonstration project authority, there is a 180-day waiting period following announcement of the project, allowing comments to be heard. The FAA project is currently scheduled to be implemented in May of this year. We believe the situation at these three airports is critical enough to reduce that 180-day waiting period. Our legislation would allow the pay demonstration project to start as soon as Congress passed this legislation.

This has not been a good period for the airline industry—anxiety is high among consumers, carriers, and Government regulators. When we are given the tools to address these concerns and take constructive action to ensure the safety of air travelers, we should do so quickly and fully. We urge our colleagues to join us in moving this legislation quickly, and allowing these airports to function as safely and efficiently as they can.●

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to commend my colleague, Senator SIMON, for his diligent efforts on behalf of air traffic controllers and the traveling community in general. We have a mission to accomplish today. That is to bring back confidence in the air traffic system.

Up to now, we've been rather upset at the way the Federal Aviation Administration handled the crisis in the Chicago airspace. I am pleased with this development, however. The pay demonstration project that we are attempting to implement will help solve a problem that has troubled me since the crisis began: not enough controllers want to work or are working in the facilities covering our Nation's busiest airports. What incentive is there to work in an expensive city at a busy facility when someone can earn the same money in sunny climes at an airport with moderate traffic? Absolutely none until now.

The demonstration project must be implemented soon. That is why Senator SIMON and I have introduced this bill. The traveling public needs to know that we take their safety seriously, and our Nation's air traffic controllers and support staff need to know that we take their jobs seriously. I urge the Senate to take immediate action on this bill and send the right signals about our commitment to air safety.●

By Mr. REID (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. DODD, Mr. LEVIN of Michigan and Mr. BRYAN):

S. 469. A bill to amend the enforcement provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

FEDERAL ELECTION ENFORCEMENT ACT

Mr. REID. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to provide for more effective enforcement of our Federal election laws. I am proud to be joined in this effort by original cosponsors Senators BURDICK, ADAMS, BOREN, CONRAD, MOYNIHAN, SANFORD, DODD, LEVIN of Michigan and BRYAN.

We talk a great deal in this Chamber about the need to change our election laws, and I agree wholeheartedly with the reforms suggested in S. 137, Senator BOREN's Senatorial Election Campaign Act of 1989. In fact, I am an original cosponsor of that bill. But, in addition to these reforms, we must address the issue of enforcement. After all, what good are our laws if they are not enforced? Currently, the penalties for election law violations are too little, too late. As Germond and Witcover pointed out in an article that appeared in the Baltimore Evening Sun last month, the message of FEC enforcement is "we can only lock the barn after the horse is stolen."

Candidates can win elections by violating election laws. Often they are not penalized at all, and even if they are penalized—the fines amount to a mere slap on the wrist, years after the violation occurred. This hardly deters the successful candidate.

The Federal Election Enforcement Act addresses this problem by shortening the process and making the penalties more severe.

Currently, the law provides caps on penalties. This has led to ridiculously low penalties for serious violations of the law. This bill would change that by providing for minimum penalties equal to the amount of the violation. Only this way can we encourage people to know and abide by the law. In addition, the bill reduces the time required for conciliation agreements and provides minimum penalties that will limit the negotiating posture of alleged violaters. The Federal Election Enforcement Act also includes technical changes in Federal Election Law providing the FEC with the authority to issue injunctions and replacing the "reason to believe" standard with the Federal rules 12(b)(6) standard of failure to state a claim. The bill also addresses the problem caused by the often partisan 3-3 votes of the Commission which stop enforcement in its tracks. Under FEEA, the party alleging a violation will be given a private right of action in cases where the Commission fails to act because of a 3-3 vote. The bill also provides for the award of attorney's fees to the prevailing party.

The message this bill sends is a simple one: if we are going to have election laws, lets enforce them, if we are going to penalize violaters, lets have penalties that deter violations.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the Fair Campaign Enforcement Act introduced today by my good friend from Nevada Senator REID. This bill, which I supported in the 100th Congress, takes a belated first step to correct one of the long neglected problems of guaranteeing fair elections: Poor enforcement of campaign laws, something that often gives an advantage to those breaking the law, and penalizes those abiding by it. While the Senate was deadlocked on campaign finance reform measures last Congress, there is hope that we will take a bipartisan step toward reform this time.

My frustration with the enforcement of campaign finance law is borne from firsthand experience. In 1982, I was targeted for defeat by a political smear organization called the National Conservative Political Action Committee, or NCPAC. NCPAC is now swamped with debt and all but defunct, but in the early 1980's, it effectively slung mud and grossly violated campaign laws in its attempts to defeat liberal lawmakers. During my campaign, the director of NCPAC's supposedly independent advertising campaign in New York State was also on the payroll of one of my Republican opponents. This in complete violation of Federal campaign law.

In January 1982, the New York State Democratic Committee filed suit against NCPAC and my opponent. More than 2 years later, the Federal Election Commission [FEC] finally filed suit against NCPAC. More than 2 years after that, a U.S. district court judge ruled that NCPAC had violated campaign law, forcing the group to settle with the FEC. Three and one-half years had passed since the election had been decided.

Fortunately, this long delay had no effect on the ultimate outcome of the election. But it might have. The perpetrators of the crime banked on the fact that by the time they were caught and punished, the damage they sought to inflict would be long done. And this was not an isolated incident. Mr. President, I submit that it is damaging to the integrity of the democratic process to give such an advantage to the lawbreakers that crimes are practically encouraged and rewarded. We must takes steps to ensure that the Federal Election Commission has no excuse for not carrying out its mission swiftly and effectively, and to ensure that elections cannot be stolen.

I believe the Fair Campaign Enforcement Act is one such step. The bill will require substantial penalties for violations of the law. It will require that the FEC take action more quickly against alleged violations. It will permit quicker access to the courts when the Commission fails to reasonably pursue a violation. These changes, I believe, will begin to tip the balance away from the lawbreaker, and ensure that election laws are fairly—and promptly—enforced.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Washington Post on the not-so-swift enforcement of Federal campaign law be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 22, 1986]

THE FEC's GOOD NEWS

The good news is that the Federal Election Commission has won victories in two important cases. The bad news is—well, you begin to get the idea when you know that the cases arose in the 1982 and 1984 campaigns. The FEC has done a good job of closing the barn door, but the barn has been empty for years. The question is now whether, in comparable future cases, the commission can get it closed in time.

The first of these victories came in a case brought against NCPAC concerning the 1982 senatorial campaign of Bruce Caputo. NCPAC (under the name of "New Yorkers Fed Up With Moynihan") made what it claimed were "independent expenditures" substantially above the amount it could contribute directly to Mr. Caputo's campaign. That's legal, so long as "independent" means what it says—i.e., that there is no collusion or contact between the contributor and any candidate who is a beneficiary. But in this case both NCPAC and the Caputo campaign used the same pollster, Arthur Finkelstein. They could hardly be said to be independent unless the Caputo side of Mr. Finkelstein's brain refrained from communicating with the NCPAC side. The FEC sued NCPAC and won in federal court in Manhattan—but not until last Friday.

The second case was brought against the National Congressional Club and Jefferson Marketing, both controlled by associates of Sen. Jesse Helms. The charge is that Jefferson Marketing provided services to Helms-backed candidates at rates so far below market rates that they amounted to contributions above the limits set by law. Jefferson Marketing has signed a consent decree, agreeing to separate its ownership from the Congressional Club and to pay a $10,000 fine. This may prevent future violations. But a $10,000 fine seems a small price to pay for a violation that may have affected the outcome of a Senate campaign in which $26 million was spent and which was decided by 86,000 votes of 2.2 million cast.

These cases may be moot for most of the parties concerned: Mr. Caputo, for one, withdrew from the 1982 race long before the election, when it was revealed that his claim to have served in the military was false; NCPAC has had its financial woes of late. But the principles remain important, and the results show that the commission can do something about those who wink at the law. The mystery is why these cases took so long.

For this some blame must go to the defendants, who predictably delayed things as much as they could, and some to the courts; the FEC went to court against NCPAC in February 1984 and against Jefferson Marketing in February 1985. But blame must also go to the commission. These violations were about as clear-cut as one can find, and the complaints were brought well before the elections. Yet the FEC took 20 months to find probable cause that NCPAC violated the law—14 months after the election. In the Jefferson Marketing case, the commission made its finding 17 months after the complaint and three weeks before the election; but it allowed another four months for "conciliation." The FEC needs to act more quickly. As things now stand, those who obey the law are not to be put at an unfair disadvantage by those who violate it.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 470. A bill to provide better bus transportation services for residents of rural areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

RURAL BUS SERVICES ACT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am proud to introduce a bill designed to improve bus transportation services for residents of rural areas.

In August 1988, the surface transportation subcommittee held a hearing in Omaha, NE, on passenger bus service, which followed a 2-day conference on reconnecting rural America. At that hearing we focused on the adequacy of existing interstate and intercity passenger bus service, the prospects for continuation of service and the need for a redistribution of Federal and State transportation funding to ensure continued service.

There is no doubt that rural America has been affected by the operation and structure of the bus industry since enactment of the Bus Regulatory Reform Act of 1982. By utilizing market freedoms under the 1982 reform act, carriers discontinued many unprofitable routes, and smaller carriers have established service in areas where demand still exists.

An analysis by the Interstate Commerce Commission found that between 1982 and 1986, approximately 3,400 communities, nine-tenths of them with populations of under 10,000, lost all intercity bus service.

In my home State of Nebraska, a good example of this nationwide problem for rural transportation is currently taking place. It involves the possible loss of the only intercity bus service through northern Nebraska, which runs from Omaha through northern Nebraska and up to Rapid City, SD.

The loss of this Black Hills Stateline route would end intercity bus service through such major northern Nebraska cities as Norfolk, Neligh, O'Neill, Bassett, Valentine, Rushville, Chadron, Ainsworth, and others. Only two of those cities have air service under the essential air services program. None of those cities is served by Amtrak.

However, this particular problem in Nebraska is hardly unique throughout rural America. There is clearly a need for some creative and innovative approaches and the establishment of a new rural transportation policy.

The legislation I am introducing today, known as the Rural Bus Services Act, specifically provides assistance to States and local communities facing loss of intercity bus service.

After deregulation of the airline industry, a safety net program was implemented to assist in keeping essential air service in smaller cities and communities threatened by loss of service. Intercity rail passenger transportation has Amtrak for essential rail transportation. Although there was language originally establishing a safety net program for intercity bus transportation, it was eventually deleted from the 1982 Bus Deregulation Act prior to its final passage. This legislation revives that program, with some modification, and funds this program by changing distribution of urban mass transportation funds.

The bill also increases the minimum share of funds allocated to provide transportation assistance to nonurbanized areas from the current 2.93 percent to 7 percent of total funds. That is a modest request.

For far too long, smaller communities and rural areas have not received an adequate share of UMTA resources. Out of the 7 percent funding mix created by this legislation, 1 percent or one-seventh of these funds would be available to carry out the new program for the improvement of intercity bus service, and for the establishment and maintenance of certain rural feeder services. The remainder would be available to help out existing rural transit programs.

I hope this legislation will provide the necessary tools for States and the incentives for existing transit providers to bring passengers from rural areas to hub cities, thereby linking local communities with other intercity carriers, as well as expand programs such as the Rural Connection Program initiated recently by Greyhound.

The bill also provides for the establishment of a pilot program to assess the feasibility of combining express pickup and delivery of small packages with passenger transportation in rural areas. Currently, rural transit systems can feed passengers to intercity carriers but are generally prevented from providing package delivery because of barriers established by State regulatory commissions.

A requirement of the legislation would be that DOT conduct a study to determine the extent to which this kind of limited pickup and delivery and passenger service is dependent upon Federal preemption of State regulation.

It is my hope that this bill will bring greater equity to our national transportation funding policy, increase assistance for transit in rural areas, and increase the mobility of the groups recognized as most dependent on intercity bus transportation, such as the poor, the elderly, and the handicapped. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 470

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Rural Bus Services Act".

INTERCITY BUS SERVICE

SEC. 2. The Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 (49 App. U.S.C. 1601 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"INTERCITY BUS SERVICE

"SEC. 26. (a) The Secretary is autorized to make grants for the initiation, improvement, or continuation of intercity bus service, and for the establishment and maintenance of rural feeder services, for residents of rural areas and residents of urban places designated by the Bureau of the Census as having populations of 5,000 or more which are not within an urbanized area.

"(b) Grants for the initiation, improvement, or continuation of intercity bus service under subsection (a) of this section shall be made only to States and local public bodies and agencies thereof, only for payment of operating expenses incurred in furnishing such intercity bus service, and shall not exceed 30 percent of the net cost of such an operating expenses project. The remainder of such cost shall be provided in cash from sources other than Federal funds. Such grants shall be subject to such other terms, conditions, and requirements as the Secretary may consider necessary to promote the initiation, improvement, or continuation of privately owned and operated intercity bus service. To the maximum extent feasible, assistance shall be distributed by the Secretary only for privately owned intercity bus companies to subsidize deficit operations considering the profitability of the route as a whole. The determination of profitability shall include all income generated by the route and only direct costs of the operation of the route. In making any such grant with respect to service in a particular general area, the Secretary shall give preference to applications involving a private bus operator which lawfully has provided intercity bus service within that area during the 1-year period preceding the date of application for such a grant, as compared to applications involving proposals for such service by any other operator.

"(c) Grants for the establishment and maintenance of rural feeder services under subsection (a) of this section shall be made only to States and local public bodies thereof in order to provide financial and other incentive for such establishment and maintenance. Such incentives may include—

"(1) supplemental operating assistance to permit daily service;

"(2) extension of authorized operating hours to facilitate connections with bus and railroad services that operate in nationwide interstate commerce;

"(3) subsidization of fares; and

"(4) establishment of a special fund to pay for the marketing of rural connections and rural feeder services.

"(d) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'intercity bus service' means transportation provided to the public by a private bus operator authorized to transport passengers in interstate commerce by the Interstate Commerce Commission or in intrastate commerce by a State regulatory commission or comparable State agency (A) between one urban place as designated in accordance with subsection (a) and another such urban place, (B) between such an urban place and an urbanized area, or (C) between one urbanized area and another urbanized area, through rural areas or such urban places, or both, except that the term does not include local service; and

"(2) 'rural feeder services' means transportation provided to the public which is designed to facilitate connections between a rural area and bus and railroad services that operate in nationwide interstate commerce.".

FUNDING FOR RURAL PROGRAMS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 21 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 (49 App. U.S.C. 1617) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(1), by striking "sections 9 and 18" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 9, 18, and 26"; and

(2) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

"(e) For each of fiscal years 1987 through 1989, 2.93 percent of the aggregate funds made available for sections 9, 18, and 26 and section 9B under subsections (a)(1) and (b) of this section shall be available to carry out sections 18 and 26. For each of fiscal years 1990 through 1992, 7 percent of such aggregate funds shall be available to carry out sections 18 and 26, of which 1 percent of such aggregate funds shall be available to carry out section 26. All amounts made available for sections 18 and 26 shall be from funds appropriated under subsection (a).".

(b) Section 9(a)(2) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 (49 App. U.S.C. 1607a(a)(2)) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end the following: ", except that for each of fiscal years 1990 through 1992, not to exceed 84.36 per centum shall be available for such expenditure".

EXPRESS PICKUP AND DELIVERY OF SMALL PACKAGES

SEC. 4. (a)(1) The Secretary of Transportation shall establish pilot projects for the purpose of providing incentives for rural feeder services (as defined under section 26 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964) to combine express pickup and delivery of small packages with passenger transportation.

(2) The Secretary shall, not later than 9 months after the date of enactment of this Act, make grants for the projects referred to in paragraph (1), which shall not exceed 18 months in duration. The grants shall be made only to States and local public bodies and agencies thereof and shall not exceed 20 percent of the net cost of providing such pickup and delivery. The remainder of such cost shall be provided from sources other than Federal funds.

(3) In making grants under this section, the Secretary shall, in consultation with the Interstate Commerce Commission, give preference to applicants which—

(A) demonstrate a serious community need for such pickup and delivery, in light of such circumstances as availability and proximity of existing pickup and delivery services; and

(B) propose services by private bus operators with proven expertise in intercity bus services (as defined under section 26 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964) which possess a reasonable likelihood of continuing such pickup and delivery after grant assistance under this section has terminated.

(4) No grant under this section shall be made after September 30, 1991.

(5) Section 4(i) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 (49 App. U.S.C. 1603(i)) is amended by inserting, immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence, the following: ", including projects referred to in section 4(a)(1) of the Rural Bus Services Act".

(b) The Secretary shall conduct a study to evaluate the extent to which such pickup and delivery is dependent upon Federal preemption of State regulation. The Secretary shall, not later than 12 months after the date of enactment of this Act, report to Congress on the results of such study.

S. 472. A bill to amend the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, fiscal years 1988 and 1989, to extend the period during which aliens may not be denied visas on certain grounds, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLARIFICATIONS TO MC CARRAN-WALTER PROVISIONS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill, for myself and Mr. SIMPSON, which clarifies modifications made last year in the Foreign Operations Appropriations Act, fiscal year 1989 to section 901 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, fiscal years 1988 and 1989. Section 901 concerns the exclusion of aliens from the United States on the basis of their political beliefs. Due to drafting errors, the law was not as clear as it might be. This bill goes some way to clarify that law. I am pleased to say that this bill has the support of the chairman and ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I hope we can look forward to its early passage.●

By Mr. GRAMM:

S. 474. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to deny the adjudication of certain political asylum claims made in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POLITICAL ASYLUM APPLICATION REFORM ACT OF 1989

● Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that seeks to close a loophole in our immigration law which has been exploited by refugees from throughout Central America. The result of this activity is that small communities in south Texas have been overwhelmed as they struggle to cope with the thousands of people who have streamed into the United States.

Most of these individuals have requested political asylum after they have reached the United States. Under existing law, an asylum request initiates a specific administrative and judicial process which can take years to conclude if every appeal right is exercised and if the individual seeking asylum is determined to exploit every conceivable avenue that the law currently allows to be explored in the asylum process.

The problem that we have, Mr. President, is that the U.S. political asylum process was designed to accommodate a single, unique circumstance. It was never designed to accommodate tens of thousands of requests made by individuals who clearly do not meet the threshold test of political asylum, "* * * a well founded fear of persecution * * *" in their homeland.

Most of the refugees appearing in south Texas and requesting political asylum have had to pass through one or more countries in order to get to the United States and make their asylum claims. If they were truly fleeing political oppression, it would seem as though they would either be applying for asylum in one of the nations that they must pass through in order to reach the United States or that they would exercise their right to apply for refugee status before reaching the United States.

However, neither of these options would provide the benefits that can be obtained by actually reaching the United States and making the asylum claim. In many cases, once the asylum process has begun, the potential asylee is free to travel throughout the United States, obtain a job, and either begin the process of assimilation or begin working the legal process as I have described.

President Bush and Attorney General Thornburgh have moved to control the situation in south Texas by sending additional Border Patrol and Immigration and Naturalization Service personnel to the area. The INS is detaining political asylum applicants and this policy has already resulted in a dramatic reduction in the number of individuals requesting political asylum. These administrative procedures have had their intended effect but, in my opinion, we need a permanent, legislative solution as well.

In order to close this loophole, I am introducing legislation which will mandate that individuals seeking asylum in the United States who come from North, Central or South American nations and who have traveled through a third nation, a so-called safe haven country, on their way to the United States, must file their application for asylum while they are in the safe haven nation.

In other words, I propose to restrict the processing of political asylum requests made in the United States by individuals who have had an opportunity to make such a request before they actually arrive here. Such requests could be made at U.S. Embassy or consular facilities or perhaps at sites which the State Department may wish to designate for such purposes.

The bill provides for expedited exclusion and deportation proceedings for those who violate the new asylum request procedure.

By closing this loophole in this manner, we will still be able to protect those who are fleeing oppression and have a legitimate fear for their safety but we will thwart those who would bend the system to their own designs.

I encourage my colleagues to review this proposal and work to ensure its swift enactment. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 474

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Political Asylum Application Reform Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. AMENDMENT TO THE IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT.

Section 208 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1158(a)) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking out "(a) The" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) Except as provided in subsection (d), the"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) No claim for asylum by any alien entrant in the United States may be adjudicated except on the limited grounds of paragraph (2) if the alien—

"(A) is a native of a country in North, South, or Central America; and

"(B) who—

"(i) had the opportunity in a safe haven country to file an application (or maintain an application previously filed) for refugee status in the United States; and

"(ii) either (I) did not file or maintain an application in any safe haven country or (II) filed or maintained an application and refugee status was denied or a decision on refugee status was pending on the date of the alien's entry into the United States.

"(2)(A) For each alien applying for asylum in the United States, an immigration officer shall make an initial determination as to whether such alien is ineligible for asylum under paragraph (1). The burden of proof is on the alien to demonstrate that he is not ineligible for asylum under paragraph (1).

"(B) If the immigration officer determines such ineligibility, then the alien shall be excluded or deported from the United States. The decision of the immigration officer is final, conclusive, and not subject to administrative appeal or judicial review. A denial of a claim of asylum under this subsection shall also be treated as a denial of a request for withholding of deportation under section 243(h).

"(3) Any alien excluded or deported from the United States under paragraph (2) may file, without prejudice, an application in a safe haven country for refugee status in the United States.

"(4) For purposes of paragraph (1), an alien shall be deemed to have had the opportunity in a safe haven country to file an application (or maintain an application previously filed) for refugee status in the United States if—

"(A) the alien transited or resided in that country before the alien's entry into the United States; and

"(B) the alien was not—

"(i) in the custody of governmental authorities for the duration of the alien's stay in that country; or

"(ii) on board a vessel or air carrier which did not disembark passengers in that country.

"(5) The Attorney General and the Secretary of State shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(6) It is the sense of the Congress that the President should take into account the number of asylum claims denied under paragraph (2) in making his determination of refugee admissions for a fiscal year pursuant to section 207(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

"(7) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) the term 'alien entrant in the United States' means an alien—

"(i) who—

"(I) was paroled into the United States and has not acquired any other status under the Immigration and Nationality Act;

"(II) is the subject of exclusion or deportation proceedings under the Immigration and Nationality Act; or

"(III) was not lawfully admitted to the United States and has an application for asylum pending with the Immigration and Naturalization Service; and

"(ii) with respect to whom a final, nonappealable, and legally enforceable order of exclusion or deportation has not been entered; and

"(B) the term 'safe haven country' means a country (other than the country of the alien's nationality or, in the case of an alien having no nationality, a country other than the country of the alien's last habitual residence) with which the United States has consular relations.".

SEC. 3. APPLICABILITY OF PROVISIONS.

The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply to aliens entering the United States on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. SIMON:

S. 475. A bill to authorize a certificate of documentation for a vessel; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

DOCUMENTATION OF A VESSEL

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation that would grant a waiver for documentation of a vessel located in Illinois. The vessel is operated on Lake Michigan by Margaret Montvid, a licensed U.S. merchant marine captain, and her husband. The Montvids' daughter purchased the vessel for $30,000 with the understanding that it would be eligible for redocumentation for a Great Lakes Trade Endorsement in time for the start of the coho salmon season starting in April last year.

Title 46, United States Code, together with the Jones Act, requires that vessels engaged in domestic coastwide trade be built and documented in the United States. These laws apply to all vessels irrespective of size or intended use. Furthermore, these provisions of law permanently terminate the coastwise privileges for U.S. built vessels that are later sold to foreign citizens. The owner must be able to provide all the documents establishing U.S. manufacture and U.S. citizenship of the builder and each individual in the chain of ownership.

Nancy Ann, official number 901962, was listed in the Boat Manufacturer's guide as a Baja 31 Fisherman built in 1975 by the Southampton Marine Co. in Berlin, NJ. This company went out of business in 1975, and the manufacturer's agent, Premier Sport's Marine, a disadvantaged business enterprise cannot be located. The boat has had 11 owners and documentation is missing for only 2 including Premier Sport's Marine. Marine Loan Security sent certified letters to all the others, but it was only after repeated phone calls by Mrs. Montvid, that many of these previous owners responded.

Now, over a year after the boat was purchased and the Montvids invested an additional $15,000 in Nancy Ann for instrumentation and fishing equipment, this legislation will permit them to join other commercial charter operators at the new Northpoint Marina ner Zion, IL.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 475

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, Notwithstanding sections 12105, 12106, 12107, and 12108 of title 46, United States Code, and section 27 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920 (46 App. U.S.C. 883), as applicable on the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating may issue a certificate of documentation for the vessel Nancy Ann, United States official number 901962.●

By Mr. SIMON:

S. 476. A bill to increase the number of refugee admission numbers allocated for Eastern Europe/Soviet Union and East Asia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REFUGEE EMERGENCY ADMISSIONS ACT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation on a matter not of concern not only in my home State, but throughout the world. I am referring to the inability of our Government to accommodate the needs of persecuted religious minorities from the Soviet Union and Eastern bloc nations.

I, as well as many of my colleagues, have become increasingly concerned about the refugee situation in Rome and Vienna involving Soviet Jews, Poles, and others fleeing persecution in that part of the world. Neither the State Department nor the Immigration and Naturalization Service seem adequately prepared to process the increasing numbers and I am disturbed that the President has yet to propose additional visa numbers and funding to the Congress.

What otherwise would be a historic opportunity for freedom for tens of thousands is turning into a bureaucratic nightmare. The available details about INS processing of refugee applications in Rome, as well as projections for future flows, dictate that immediate action be taken.

Today, therefore, I am introducing legislation requiring the President to increase our refugee admissions numbers by 39,000 for this fiscal year. The 39,000 admissions will be allocated for 25,000 Soviet refugees and 7,500 Eastern European refugees. In addition, my legislation will restore the visa numbers for Southeast Asian refugees which the President reallocated as an emergency measure in anticipation of this crisis. I share the belief of many of my friends in the Jewish community that we should not balance this crisis on the backs of Southeast Asian refugees or any other refugees.

We are in danger of losing a historic opportunity for freedom for Soviet Jews. I believe my legislation is a first step to enable us to fully address their needs and give us time for more long-term workable solutions. I urge my colleagues to join me.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 476

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. INCREASE IN REFUGEE ADMISSIONS FOR EASTERN EUROPE/SOVIET UNION AND FOR EAST ASIA.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President shall, in addition to the worldwide refugee admissions determined by the President for fiscal year 1989, increase such number by 39,000 refugee admission numbers, to be allocated as follows:

(1) 25,000 numbers shall be allocated for Soviet refugees.

(2) 7,500 numbers shall be allocated for Eastern European refugees.

(3) 5,000 numbers shall be allocated under the Orderly Departure Program for East Asian refugees.

(4) 1,000 numbers shall be allocated for first asylum refugees from East Asia.

(5) 500 numbers shall be allocated for refugees from the Near East and South East.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to provide assistance necessary for the admission of refugees under subsection (a).●

By Mr. MACK (for himself and Mr. GRAHAM):

S. 477. A bill to require the use, in Federal formula grant programs, of adjusted census data, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FAIR SHARE ACT

● Mr. MACK. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to ensure that Federal funds are channeled back to States in the manner reflecting the intent of Congress. The Fair Share Act of 1989 would ensure that Federal funds to States are allocated in accordance with population counts based on the most recent available data, instead of outdated population estimates.

All we need to do is require the various agencies of the Federal Government to use data which is currently published by the Bureau of the Census. Annual updates are already generated by Census and the agencies, of course, routinely calculate State allocations of Federal funds. It's just a matter of requiring the agencies to plug in the most recent data into their formulas.

Right now, agencies pursue a random and somewhat haphazard way of allocating Federal funds. Some agencies use annual updated census figures; some use only old decennial census data; some generate their own data; and some use various figures for various programs.

The General Accounting Office has published a study in 1987 showing 51 Federal grants programs that use decennial census data in allocating funds to States. America is an increasingly mobile society. Federal grant programs based on population should reflect this mobility. Not considering this mobility means that States with growing populations, such as those in the Sun Belt, are unfairly penalized.

My home State of Florida had a population of 9,746,324 in 1980. By 1988, Florida's population had grown to 12,377,000—an increase of 26 percent. In 1987, Florida had become the fourth largest State in the Nation. To ignore Florida's dramatic population growth in the last 8 years is to defy the intent of Congress when it initiated these population-based grant programs. These are dollars which are not only much needed by the State, but funds which should be returned to Florida, according to Congress, the result is that Floridians see far fewer of their tax dollars returned to them than they should.

It is not necessary to use old population data. We have annual population updates produced by the Bureau of the Census every July that are automatically distributed to every agency in the Government. No one questions the reliability of these updates. It just makes good sense to use them. Many Federal program administrators already use these updates. All programs should use them.

Mr. President, I would like to cite the findings of a report released by the Sun Belt Institute. The research, conducted by Dr. Bernard Weinstein, is extremely illuminating. Dr. Weinstein's analysis reaches three important conclusions:

First, since 1950, the Sun Belt's share of Federal grants has fallen dramatically while the position of other regions has improved.

Second, this shift has exacerbated, not improved, economic dislocations affecting much of the Sun Belt.

Third, the reason for the regional imbalance is clearly biased and misdirected Federal formula grants, and a steady flow of Federal procurement dollars to States outside of the Sun Belt.

The legislation I am introducing today will not solve all of the problems linked to Federal funding and population shifts. But it will address the part of the problem easiest to solve. We can and should eliminate the gross distortions in Federal allocations to States resulting from the use of outdated population figures. I am also asking the General Accounting Office to update their study of grant formulas with special attention to this problem.

The Fair Share Act of 1989 which I am introducing today also includes an important safety feature: The Office of Management and Budget would be required to compile a list of all Federal grant programs that use decennial census data. When the law's requirement for the use of annual updates kicks in, OMB could grant a waiver for a program where use of such an update would be inappropriate.

I would like to urge my colleagues to support the Fair Share Act of 1989.●

By Mr. DODD (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. HATCH, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. SIMON, Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 478. A bill to provide Federal assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL BOARD FOR PROFESSIONAL TEACHING STANDARDS ACT

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to provide $25 million over 3 years to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards for the research and development of equitable and comprehensive methods of assessment for the voluntary certification of teachers. I am pleased to have my colleagues, Senators PELL, HATCH, KENNEDY, MATSUNAGA, SIMON, COCHRAN, and CHAFEE join me today as cosponsors of this legislation.

The nonprofit Board for Professional Teaching Standards was created in 1987, pursuant to the recommendations of the Carnegie Forum outlined in "A Nation Prepared: Teachers for the 21st Century." The board, chaired by James B., Hunt, Jr., former Governor of North Carolina, has designed the voluntary certification process to parallel, and not conflict with or replace, State licensing. Two-thirds of the members of the national board are from the teaching profession and one-third from State and local government and school administration. The voluntary nature of the certification process would give teachers the option of participation. I am joined by nearly every segment of the education community in support of the board.

Why should we provide Federal funds to a private organization to establish a national board for teacher certification? The answer lies in the educational challenge facing America today.

We are adopting an unusual approach because of the unusual problem. As our Nation strives to develop an educational system that will enable us to compete in the increasingly competitive international marketplace, more than a few obstacles stand in the way of educational excellence. Our problems are myriad. Thirty percent of our youth are dropping out of school. On a recent international test, U.S. students scored far below those of our economic competitors on math and science problems. School districts around the Nation are facing shortages of math, science, and foreign language teachers. It is also estimated that as many as two-thirds of active teachers will be retiring by the year 2000. Furthermore, schools are tackling such complex problems as drugs, teenage pregnancy, and violence.

The private sector is already feeling the pinch of fewer and fewer workers skilled to fill job openings. States with the lowest unemployment rates, like Connecticut, are struggling to fill vacancies within their companies. With over 50 percent of mothers with young children working and one out of four children living in poverty, schools today are required to do more than teach. Many, State and local governments are committed to meeting the educational challenges of the next decade, but in light of the severity of the problems, they are also encouraging Federal and private initiatives to assist their efforts.

With these challenges in mind, we need to consider the advantages of private efforts to help bolster the educational system. The responsibility of educating our Nation's youth is not solely the responsibility of our schools. It is essential that the private sector contribute to the education and training of our Nation's youth. The National Board for Professional Teaching Standards is a unique example of a private sector initiative aimed at doing just that.

The national certification board attempts to enhance the quality of teaching by setting a high national standard of teaching excellence. The board's focus on teachers is unique. It recognizes that teachers are the backbone of our schools. It recognizes that they are faced each day with the challenge to motivate and teach our youth. A voluntary certification process would provide national continuity and respect to the teaching force. It would give teachers a means of distinguishing their ability at a national level and emphasize the national concern for quality teaching.

Now that I have painted a grim, but realistic picture of the challenges facing our educational infrastructure and the important role of teachers, let me point to the utility of a national certification process. First, it would complement the efforts on behalf of Federal, State, and local governments to strive for education excellence. It is a well-known fact that our educational system needs bolstering. The board's efforts to identify high standards of teaching and recognize those teachers who meet those standards, would be most beneficial to enhancement of our educational system.

Second, the board would reinforce the need for school systems to attract and keep quality teachers. For too many years, we have neglected to give teachers the respect they deserve. And, the nature of the marketplace and the conditions of our educational system make the need for qualified and committed teachers greater today than ever before.

Third, the board's research conducted on assessment techniques would be a valuable resource to States considering changes in their licensing exams.

Additionally, the same research would be available to graduate and undergraduate teacher education programs. Such programs would be able to utilize assessment techniques for the development of course work for new teachers.

While the board will operate privately, outside the realm of the Federal, State, and local commitment to education, a contribution from the Federal Government to the research and development of the methods of assessment will help the board establish the certification process by 1993. My legislation would help assure that the assessment methods used to qualify teachers for certification are thorough and fair. The bill does not provide assistance for administrative costs. The legislation also requires that the Federal funds be matched dollar for dollar by the funds raised privately by the board.

In closing, a national certification will give teachers a set of national standards they can use to gain well-deserved recognition and respect for their abilities. I believe it would help raise teaching standards, performance, and pay, and thus improve the effectiveness and quality of teaching. The assessment techniques would provide more uniform national criteria for States to use in the upgrading of licensing standards and teacher education programs. It would also provide uniform measurement techniques for school districts to use in developing new hiring and promotion standards. Taken together these reforms would help schools to attract the best and the brightest applicants to teaching by raising the visibility and rewards of the profession.

Priority for use of the Federal funds would be given to research and development activities in mathematics, the sciences, foreign languages, and literacy. And, the board would be asked to give priority to projects which will improve the knowledge and ability of teachers that work with students of limited English proficiency, the talented and gifted, and handicapped, and those who are economically and educationally disadvantaged.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 478

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act shall be cited as the "National Board for Professional Teaching Standards Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the economic well-being and national security of the United States depends on efforts to strengthen the educational system to provide all children with an education which will ensure a well-educated workforce;

(2) improved teaching is central to the goal of ensuring a well-educated workforce;

(3) incentives to enhance the professionalism and status of teaching can be provided through the development and promulgation of voluntary standards of professional certification that are rigorous and unbiased, that complement and support State licensing practices and recognize the diversity of American society;

(4) the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, a private nonprofit organization has been created to establish such voluntary standards and a significant initial investment in research and development from non-Federal sources will be required to create such a system of professional certification; and

(5) the Federal Government has played an active role in funding vital educational research and can continue to support this national effort by providing limited but essential support for critical research activities.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to provide financial assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards to enable the board to conduct independent research and development related to the establishment of national, voluntary professional standards and assessment methods for the teaching profession.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For the purpose of this Act—

(1) The term "Board" means the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards.

(2) The term "Committee" means the Research and Advisory Committee established pursuant to section 5 of this Act.

(3) The term "elementary school" has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(8) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(4) The term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(21) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(5) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

SEC. 4. PROGRAM AUTHORIZATION.

(a) PROGRAM AUTHORIZED.—From sums appropriated under subsection (b) in any fiscal year, the Secretary is authorized and directed, in accordance with this Act, to provide financial assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, in order to pay the Federal share of the costs of the activities described in section 6.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $25,000,000 for the period beginning October 1, 1989, and ending September 30, 1992.

(c) TERMS AND CONDITIONS.—(1) No financial assistance may be made available under this Act except upon an application as required by section 7.

(2) No financial assistance may be made available under this Act unless the Secretary determines that—

(A) the Board will comply with the provisions of this Act;

(B) the Board will use the Federal funds only for research and development activities in accordance with section 6 and such teacher assessment and certification procedures will be free from racial, cultural, gender or regional bias;

(C) the Board—

(i) will widely disseminate for review and comment announcements of specific research projects to be conducted with Federal funds, including a description of the goals and focus of the specific project involved and the specific merit review procedures and evaluation criteria to be used in the competitive award process, and

(ii) will send such announcements to the Secretary of Education, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the educational research community.

(D) the Secretary, pursuant to an arrangement with the Board, will publish the announcements described in subparagraph (C) in the Federal Register (or such other publication deemed appropriate by the Secretary) and in publications of general circulation designed to disseminate such announcements widely to the educational research community;

(E) the Board will, after offering any interested party an opportunity to make comment upon, and take exception to, the projects contained in the announcements described in subparagraph (C) for a 30-day period following publication, and after reconsidering any project upon which comment is made or to which exception is taken, through the Secretary issue a request for proposals in the Federal Register (or such other publication deemed appropriate by the Secretary) containing any revised project information;

(F) the Board will make awards of Federal funds competitively on the basis of merit, and, in the award process, the Board will select, to the extent practicable consistent with standards of excellence—

(i) a broad range of institutions associated with educational research and development; and

(ii) individuals who are broadly representative of the educational research and teaching communities with expertise in the specific area of research and development in question;

(G) the Board will adopt audit practices customarily applied to nonprofit private organizations and will comply with section 9(c);

(H) the Board will not use Federal funds to meet the administrative and operating expenses of the Board;

(I) the Board will submit an annual report to Congress in accordance with the provisions of section 9(a); and

(J) the Board will, upon request, disseminate to States, local educational agencies, or other public educational entities the results of any research or research project produced with funds authorized by this Act, upon the payment of the cost of reproducing the appropriate material.

(d) AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS.—(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, funds appropriated to carry out this Act shall remain available for obligation and expenditure until the end of the second fiscal year succeeding the fiscal year for which the funds were appropriated.

(2) No funds shall be made available to the Board after September 30, 1992, except as authorized by paragraph (1) of this subsection.

SEC. 5. RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Board shall establish a Research and Development Advisory Committee composed of ten recognized scholars and experts in teaching, assessment, and other relevant fields. In carrying out the previous sentence the Board shall appoint two individuals selected by the Secretary. The Board shall consult with the Secretary of Education, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the educational research community on the appointment of other Members to the Committee.

(b) FUNCTIONS.—The Committee shall advise the Board on the design and execution of its overall research and development strategy, including procedures to assure compliance with the requirements of this Act. The procedures shall include—

(1) an outline of specific research and development agenda and activities to be conducted with the Federal funds; and

(2) provisions to ensure compliance with the open competition and merit review requirements of this Act for proposals and projects assisted under this Act.

SEC. 6. AUTHORIZED ACTIVITIES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Federal funds received under this Act may only be used for research and development activities directly related to the development of teacher assessment and certification procedures for elementary and secondary school teachers.

(b) PRIORITIES.—(1) The Board shall give priority to research and development activities in—

(A) mathematics;

(B) the sciences;

(C) foreign languages; and

(D) literacy, including the ability to read, write and analyze.

(2) The Board shall give priority to research and development activities for the certification of elementary and secondary school teachers and the need and ability of such teachers to teach special educational populations, including—

(A) limited English proficient children;

(B) gifted and talented children;

(C) handicapped children; and

(D) economically and educationally disadvantaged children.

SEC. 7. APPLICATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Board shall submit applications to the Secretary at such time and in such manner as the Secretary may reasonably require. Each such application shall—

(1) describe the activities for which assistance is sought; and

(2) provide assurances that the non-Federal share of the cost of activities of the Board is paid from non-Federal sources, together with a description of the manner in which the Board will comply with the requirements of this paragraph.

(b) APPROVAL.—The Secretary shall approve an application unless such application fails to comply with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 8. FEDERAL SHARE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall pay to the Board the Federal share of the costs of the activities of the Board for the period for which the application is approved under section 7.

(b) AMOUNT OF FEDERAL SHARE.—The Federal share shall be 50 percent of the costs of the activities described in section 6.

SEC. 9. REPORTS AND AUDITING PROVISION.

(a) NATIONAL BOARD FOR PROFESSIONAL TEACHING STANDARDS REPORT.—(1) The Board shall submit an annual report to the appropriate committees of the Congress not later than December 31 of 1990, and each succeeding year thereafter for any fiscal year in which Federal funds are expended pursuant to this Act. The Board shall disseminate the report for review and comment to the Department of Education, the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the education research community. The report shall—

(A) include a detailed financial statement and a report of the audit practices described in section 4(c)(2)(G);

(B) include a description of the general procedures to assure compliance with the requirements of this Act as required in section 6; and

(C) provide a comprehensive and detailed description of the Board's agenda, activities, and planned activities for the preceding and succeeding fiscal years, including—

(i) the Board's overall research and development program and activities;

(ii) the specific research and development projects and activities conducted with Federal funds during the preceding fiscal year, including—

(I) a description of the goals and methodology of the project;

(II) a description and assessment of the findings (or status and preliminary findings if project is not yet completed);

(III) a description of the competitive bidding process, the merit review procedures, and the evaluation criteria used to award project funds; and

(IV) a description of the Board's plans for dissemination of the findings described in clause (ii);

(iii) the specific research and development projects and activities planned to be conducted with Federal funds during the succeeding fiscal year, including the goals and methodologies to be used; and

(iv) a listing of available publications of the Board, including publications related to policies, standards and general information, research reports, and commissioned papers of the Board.

(2) The first annual report required by this subsection shall include a description of the Board's research and development agenda for the succeeding 5-year period. Such first report shall include to the maximum extent practicable, a description of specific research and development projects and activities, and the goals and methodologies of such projects and activities.

(b) ADDITIONAL REPORTS.—The Department of Education, the National Science Foundation, and the National Research Council shall report to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the compliance of the Board with the requirements of this Act not later than 30 days after the Board submits its annual report pursuant to subsection (a).

(c) AUDITING PROVISION.—The Comptroller General of the United States, and any of his authorized representatives, shall have access, for the purpose of audit and examination, to any books, documents, papers, and records of the Board, and to any recipient of the Board, that is pertinent to the sums received and disbursed under this Act.

SEC. 10. CONSTRUCTION.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to—

(1) establish a preferred national curriculum or preferred teaching methodology for elementary and secondary school instruction;

(2) infringe upon the rights and responsibilities of the States to license elementary and secondary school teachers;

(3) provide an individual certified by the Board with a right of action against a State, local educational agency, or other public educational entity for any decisions related to hiring, promotion, retention or dismissal; or

(4) authorize the Secretary to exercise supervision or control over the research program, standards, assessment practices, administration, or staffing policies of the Board.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join my colleague, Senator DODD, in introducing the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards Act. This legislation is the reintroduction of legislation we introduced last Congress with a few minor changes.

Mr. President, as I indicated last year, no issue in education today is more critical to educational excellence than that of teacher recruitment and retention. The quality of education in each school, in each school district, in each State, and in this country will reach only as far as the quality of our teachers. Yet with respect to the teacher supply, we face two critical problems: quantity and quality.

Estimates indicate that by the end of the next decade, close to 50 percent of the current teaching force will no longer be in the profession. This projection is largely based on the fact that many current teachers are soon due to retire. But it is also due to the fact that current teachers, young teachers, or teachers new to the profession experience extreme job dissatisfaction and find few incentives to remain in teaching.

The other troubling issue with respect to teacher recruitment is that of quality. The most talented of our college graduates seek careers other than teaching. Low pay, long hours, and little recognition offer them virtually no incentive to become teachers.

The legislation we are introducing today seeks to address this alarming situation by injecting one of the most undervalued professions in this country with a strong dose of professionalism. Our bill would provide $25 million over 3 years for research and development carried out by the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards to develop a national certification program for teachers.

Such a certification will establish a national standard of excellence for teachers to demonstrate they have met. The research and development required for this undertaking will be massive. Great care must be taken to develop assessments that will evaluate the teacher as a whole—to evaluate subject mastery and knowledge, and to assess the ability to translate that knowledge to the student, from the gifted and talented to the educationally disadvantaged. This is particularly difficult because these assessments must also be carefully constructed to allow no room for bias or favoritism.

Board certification will require the development of assessments in basic academic areas such as English, mathematics, science, and social studies. In addition, it will require assessments in biology, chemistry, and physics. It will require separate tests for elementary school teachers and for secondary school teachers.

This considerable project will take 3 to 5 years to complete and it is estimated that the total cost will be in the neighborhood of $50 million. In that regard, it is very significant that the Board has agreed to match, dollar for dollar, the Federal contribution of $25 million.

Once these assessments are developed, teachers will be able to sit for national certification. Certification will be strictly voluntary, and we have included specific legislative language to that effect.

Support for the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards is an important investment in upgrading the prestige of teaching. It offers teachers independent and indisputable confirmation of their ability. But its most fundamental contribution is that it will establish a professional standard for teachers, much like those that exist for lawyers and physicians.

Mr. President, the legislation we are introducing today begins our long journey toward ensuring that teaching is an honored and valued profession. It is by no means a cure-all, but it is an important beginning. Its undertaking is essential, for we must face the simple reality that we cannot continue to demand much from our teachers but offer little in return.

It is with this in mind that I commend this legislation to my colleagues and hope that they will join us in its active support.●

By Mr. HELMS:

S.J. Res. 66. Joint resolution to designate the third week of June 1989 as "National Dairy Goat Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DAIRY GOAT AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am today offering Senate Joint Resolution 66 to designate the third week of June as "National Dairy Goat Awareness Week," and I ask that the resolution be appropriately referred.

Last year when I offered a similar resolution, there was a modicum of hooting and jeering by some elements of the news media. But the derision disclosed more about the news media than they realize. For one thing it showed a high degree of ignorance about the dairy goat industry in the United States.

For more than 7,000 years, dairy goats have supplied mankind with food and shelter. Dairy goats were an important part of the necessities that the early settlers brought to these shores. As pioneers moved across this land, dairy goats went with them. These animals have always been a part of the typical American farm in every region of the United States. Today there are over 250,000 dairy goats in this country.

Mr. President, while goat milk, ice cream, and yogurt are sold in many parts of the United States, the best known goat milk product is goat cheese or chevre. During the last decade, the number of domestic producers of chevre has increased dramatically; this has been due to a growing demand for American-made goat cheeses in both domestic and foreign markets. Increasing sales of American-made dairy goat products, especially cheeses, replaces imports and helps cut the U.S. trade deficit.

These facts are well known to dairy goat breeders, but few consumers are aware of the role played by the dairy goat in the American economy. Passage of this resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the week commencing June 11, 1989, and ending June 19, 1989, is recognized as "National Dairy Goat Awareness Week," will do much to educate the American people—and perhaps some in the news media—to the potential of the dairy goats and their products.

I was happy to offer this resolution last year in coordination with the distinguished chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, Mr. DE LA GARZA, who will join me in attesting that the 1988 "National Dairy Goat Week" was a fine success. I'm confident this year's will be even more productive.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Senate Joint Resolution 66 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 66

Whereas American goat cheeses are in demand by the American consumer and are replacing foreign imported cheeses;

Whereas due to the efficiency of the modern American dairy goat, which produces an excellent healthful milk, the dairy goat is becoming increasingly popular and useful on the family farm;

Whereas the American farmer has developed a dairy goat that produces superior milk and that is desired and exported worldwide; and

Whereas there is a need to further educate the American consumer as to the high nutritional value of products made from goats' milk; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

(1) the period beginning the second Saturday, and ending the third Saturday, of June of 1989, is designated as "National Dairy Goat Awareness Week"; and

(2) the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to commemorate such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BOND, Mr. BURNS, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. COATS, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. FORD, Mr. GORE, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. ROBB, Mr. SASSER, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. WILSON):

S.J. Res. 67. Joint resolution to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the Wilderness Act of 1964 which established the National Wilderness Preservation System; to the Committee on Judiciary.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ENACTMENT OF THE WILDERNESS ACT

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am going to send to the desk shortly a resolution to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the Wilderness Act of 1964. I am very pleased that 24 U.S. Senators, almost equally divided from both sides of the aisle, including my colleague, Senator BINGAMAN, have joined me in proposing this resolution to the U.S. Senate. When I am completed, it would please me if the Chair would refer the resolution to the appropriate committee of the U.S. Senate.

When Congress passed the Wilderness Act, which President Lyndon Johnson signed into law on September 3, 1964, the United States charted a course like that of no other in the history of nations. We permanently set aside for the American people areas of wild land where the forces of nature predominate and man is a visitor who does not remain.

Vast wilderness was our heritage from the time people first came to the shores of our country. A free and spirited nation was build in this new land. Establishing our great Nation required that some of the wild places be settled and some of the wilderness bounty be used. Freedom to pursue private enterprise was one of the driving forces in our growth. Mining, ranching, timbering, farming, and related land developments contributed to our welfare, our economy, and our independence. Freedom to roam unhindered through wild, pristine stretches of land helped shape our character. Conflicts arose as the population and stature of our Nation grew. From differing views our land ethic evolved. The creation of National Forests, National Parks, and National Wildlife Refuges was a first step as good stewards toward protecting our original inheritance.

Still, we had fewer wild areas as more land was settled and put to use to meet the needs of our Nation. At the same time our land ethic continued to develop. In the past wild areas were often viewed as places to be feared and conquered. But, that has changed. Wilderness has been vital to our Nation's success. As more wild areas disappeared, wilderness came to be viewed as a resource that must not be entirely consumed. Discussions focussed on the need to retain some areas in a natural state.

A landmark demonstration of these discussions occurred in New Mexico. The Forest Service, acting on its own administrative discretion in 1924, designated the first wilderness in the United States—the Gila Wilderness in southwestern New Mexico. This effort was pioneered by Aldo Leopold, who at the time worked for the Forest Service in New Mexico. Across the country other administrative designations followed.

Statutory protection for America's wilderness heritage came in 1964, with the passage of the Wilderness Act. Wilderness would be preserved. Wild, natural areas would always be there for future generations. The National Wilderness Preservation System, created by the act, was endowed originally with 54 wilderness areas covering approximately 9 million acres in 13 States. Congress has since expanded the Wilderness System to 474 units covering more than 90.1 million acres in 44 States.

We need to commemorate our Nation's accomplishment. Wilderness is a cultural heritage. Preserving it has been no small task. Decades of work by dedicated individuals, organizations, agencies, and Congress have been invested in balancing different viewpoints. Many people stand out in that effort; they all deserve credit. I have already mentioned Aldo Leopold. Being from New Mexico I want to mention another individual that means a lot to New Mexicans—Senator Clinton P. Anderson.

The late Senator Anderson, whom I was honored to succeed in the Senate, worked with others for many years in forging our Nation's original wilderness legislation. He became acquainted with the idea of wilderness preservation in personal conversations with Aldo Leopold in the 1920's. On January 14, 1963, Senator Anderson introduced S. 4 in the 88th Congress. He chaired the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to which the bill was referred. It was this bill that became the Wilderness Act of 1964.

We are proud of his contribution which meant so much to New Mexico and our Nation. There are now 24 wilderness areas in New Mexico with the potential for many more. It has been my honor to be involved as a Senator in the creation of 18 of those areas.

The complexities of balancing differing viewpoints on public policy means that our work is not done. Wise use of natural resources is the only way we know of for the people of a nation to thrive and remain strong.

Theodore Roosevelt once made a statement that serves as a good reminder. He said:

> No country can long endure if its foundations are not laid in deep material prosperity which comes from thrift, from business energy and enterprise, from hard unsparing effort in the fields of industrial activity; but neither was any nation ever yet truly great if it relied upon material prosperity alone.

Certainly, multiple-use of our Federal lands is vital. But, just as certainly we will protect our wilderness heritage.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me recall a quote by Senator Clinton Anderson. In 1961 he stated:

> Like our museums and our art galleries, our wilderness areas may at any given time be visited by a relatively small percentage of people, yet they are available to any who will use them, part of our cultural resource as well as our national heritage. We should regard them as such and cherish them.

This year we will continue to work together on wilderness questions. I encourage us to do something else this year. Let us take time to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the Wilderness Act. To this end I am introducing a joint resolution. Several of my colleagues have already cosponsored the resolution. I urge the rest of my colleagues to join me by doing the same.

Mr. President, the passage of the Wilderness Act in September of 1964 was indeed a signficant conservation act by these United States. That act was preceded decades before by some very natural and relatively easy actions. We had, in the past, created National Forests, National Wildlife Refuges; and we had created National Parks.

But a new idea came about and it was given birth in the State of New Mexico by a Forest Service expert named Aldo Leopold for whom a wilderness area in the State of New Mexico is named. As a matter of fact, the Gila Wilderness in New Mexico was the first designated wilderness in the United States. In 1924 before we officially created wilderness by statute as a nation, the Forest Service by administrative order, designated the Gila Wilderness because of the excellent ideas of Aldo Leopold.

Since that time, we have seen that, as our great Nation grows, as we move into areas that were indeed once wilderness, we tend to consume them. We either consume them for natural resources for the needs of our people or we impact them by human activity. The wilderness area is a concept that essentially says leave it just like it is; and, if you want to see it and use it, do so in a very careful way so that what nature gave us remains forever.

I am very pleased that since that time the wilderness concept originally caught on, and from an idea in the State of New Mexico ultimately sponsored here on the Senate floor and passed by the U.S. Senate under the sponsorship of my predecessor—Senator Clinton P. Anderson, wilderness areas have been designated in 44 of our States with significant momentum and rather broad-based support.

The basic concept of wilderness is mighty. It says: Keep it like the Almighty gave it to us; yet it says: Where you can, allow grazing in the area, because that is not inconsistent with grazing as it was in its natural state. You do both with reasonableness and you end up with the very best.

I know there are some who would think that wilderness areas may be a waste; there are some who think maybe we have carried it to an extreme. But, frankly, I am one who believes that, looking now on the history of our United States in many of our own backyards, when something as beautiful as American wilderness areas are abused, it is too late to save them. When we permit greed or reckless activity to take over, then there is nothing left of that which is natural—what we call wilderness.

Mr. President, we have a total of 24 Senators asking for a resolution appropriately indicating that this is the 25th anniversary of the Wilderness Act in the United States of America and that we ought to appropriately take note of the same. I hope that other Senators who have not had a chance to read my correspondence asking for their cosponsorship will do so, and I trust that before too long we will have substantially more than a majority in the U.S. Senate from both sides of the aisle supporting this.

Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk and ask that the resolution be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join Senator DOMENICI in cosponsoring this Senate joint resolution commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Wilderness Act of 1964. I would like to single out for congratulations the Wilderness Society, which for 54 years has been a leader in the preservation of our treasured wildlands.

New Mexicans have a long legacy of respect for America's precious wildlands. New Mexico is one of the great public lands States of the West and we in the land of enchantment pride ourselves for our role in helping preserve and protect these lands.

The Wilderness Act would not have been signed by President Johnson without the leadership of Senator Clinton P. Anderson, who authored the law. Anderson chaired the Senate Interior Committee and was the leader of what came to be called the Conservation Congress of the 1960's.

Southwestern New Mexico is home to the Gila Wilderness, the first wilderness area in the United States, which was administratively designated by the U.S. Forest Service in 1924. The late Aldo Leopold, a distinguished New Mexico conservationist, was the Forest Service employee who worked hardest for the designation of the Gila Wilderness. That wilderness served as my backdoor recreation area while I grew up in Silver City, New Mexico. I have spent many rewarding hours backpacking in the Gila.

Thanks to the Wilderness Act, the Gila and 473 other Wilderness units have been established in 44 States. Some 91 million acres are protected for future generations. While the Gila and other areas were protected administratively before 1964, the act was necessary to ensure protection forever. Administrative designation of wilderness was subject to the whims of everchanging administrations; the act is firm testimony to the national will to preserve pristine lands, regardless of who might be elected President.

The Wilderness Act is a landmark law that ensures preservation of special lands that provide valuable solitude, critical watershed, wildlife habitat and a legacy of our natural history. As the act says so well, "A wilderness * * * is hereby recognized as an area where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain."

The 25th anniversary of the act is well worth commemorating and I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the Senator from New Mexico in the commemoration of the 25th anniversay of the Wilderness Preservation Act. Montana is proud of the significant contribution it has made to the protection of part of our public lands heritage in a natural condition. The act of 1964 designated five areas in Montana which amounted to almost 17 percent of the total set-aside in that milestone legislation. Today Montana has 3.5 million acres of designated wilderness, over 10 percent of the area designated in the lower 48 States.

While we commemorate our existing wilderness, I want to make it clear that I do not favor a great deal of additional wilderness in Montana. The voters were pretty clear in the election that they favor multiple use in the majority of the national forests. This is the position I will maintain in future negotiations.

One of the early proponents of an enduring system of wilderness, Bob Marshall, spent the early part of his career in Montana hiking the backcountry and strengthening his resolve that a portion of the land should be left in a primitive state. Marshall later, as Director of Recreation in the Forest Service, developed the standards of wilderness management that were incorporated in the 1964 act.

Senators Mike Mansfield and Lee Metcalf of Montana were tireless supporters of wilderness throughout the United States and they will be remembered because they helped form the legacy we salute today.

Montana is rich in scenic beauty, with an abundance of fish and wildlife species, and it also is the source of several major river systems. Montana public lands are also a source for timber products, for oil and gas and other important minerals, as well as a great deal of public recreation. We are pleased to share a portion in an undeveloped form, "where man is a visitor who does not remain."

Mr. REID. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Mexico leaves the floor, I wanted to ask permission of the sponsor of that resolution to allow me to affix my name to it. I have had a lot of experience in the last few years dealing with wilderness in Nevada in one beautiful, small wilderness area that was made part of the original Wilderness Act in 1964. It is called Jarbidge. It is an Indian name. It is in northern Nevada. We look forward this year to finally resolving the problem of wilderness designations in Nevada. I think we are well along the way. I have spoken to Senator MCCLURE and I hope to have that resolved in Nevada for the Forest Service wilderness areas.

I commend and applaud the senior Senator from New Mexico for the fine statement.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I also ask that the Senator add my name as a cosponsor of his important resolution.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two Senators who have requested be added as original cosponsors of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

By Mr. BYRD (for himself, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DODD, Mr. EXON, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KERREY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. METZENBAUM, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. NUNN, Mr. PELL, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. REID, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. BOND, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. COATS, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HELMS, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. WARNER, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. ROTH):

S.J. Res. 68, Joint resolution to designate the month of May 1989 as "Trauma Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRAUMA AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am introducing a resolution that would designate the month of May 1989 as "National Trauma Awareness Month." Last year, both the Senate and the House of Representatives adopted this resolution, and I am hopeful that again this resolution will be favorably considered by the Senate.

Trauma is the third leading cause of death among persons of all ages and is the leading cause of death for individuals under age 40.

The problem of trauma can be addressed through prevention and implementation of comprehensive emergency medical systems. It is a sad fact that the incidence of trauma continues to rise, and I believe that we need to draw the public's attention to the gravity of that traumatic injury problem in the United States. I hope that by passing this resolution, we can provide an important focus on a serious medical problem.

The resolution is being cosponsored, Mr. President, by 53 other Senators, and I welcome the cosponsorship of additional Senators whose names are not yet on the resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 68

Whereas, more than eight million individuals in the United States suffer traumatic injury each year; and

Whereas, traumatic injury is the leading cause of death of individuals of less than forty years of age in the United States; and

Whereas, every individual is a potential victim of traumatic injury; and

Whereas, traumatic injury can occur without warning; and

Whereas, traumatic injury frequently renders its victims incapable of caring for themselves; and

Whereas, past inattention to the causes and effects of trauma has led to the inclusion of trauma among the most neglected medical conditions; and

Whereas, the people of the United States spend more than $110,000,000,000 annually on the problem of trauma; and

Whereas, the problem of trauma can be remedied only by prevention and proper treatment through emergency medical services and trauma systems; and

Whereas, the people of the United States must be educated in the prevention and treatment of trauma and in the proper and effective use of emergency medical services and trauma systems; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 1989 is designated as "National Trauma Awareness Month", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

SENATE RESOLUTION 71—AUTHORIZING TESTIMONY BY AN EMPLOYEE OF THE SENATE

Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. DOLE) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 71

Whereas, in the case of United States v. Ladd Anthony, Cr. No. 88-271, pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, the Department of Justice has requested the testimony of Candy Korn, a present member, and Peter Harris, a former member, of Senator Metzenbaum's staff;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony or documents, papers, and records of the Senate may be needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Candy Korn and Peter Harris are authorized to testify in the case of United States v. Ladd Anthony.

SENATE RESOLUTION 72—CONDEMNING THREATS AGAINST THE AUTHOR AND PUBLISHERS OF "SATANIC VERSES"

Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PELL, Mr. HELMS, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. GORTON, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. D'AMATO) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 72

Whereas, on February 14, 1989 Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of the Islamic Republic of Iran called for the assassination of Salman Rushdie, author of "Satanic Verses," and of the officers of Viking, the U.S. publisher of the book;

Whereas, Viking officers have received death threats since the publication of the book, and Viking offices have been evacuated several times following bomb threats;

Whereas on February 21, 1989 President George Bush condemned Iran's threat against Mr. Rushdie and his publisher as "deeply offensive to the norms of civilized behavior": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That in recognition of threats of violence made against the above mentioned author and publisher, the Senate—

(1) declares its commitment to protect the right of any person to write, publish, sell, buy, and read books without fear of intimidation and violence;

(2) unequivocally condemns as state-sponsored terrorism, the threat of the government of Iran and Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to assassinate citizens of other countries on foreign soil;

(3) expresses its support for the publishers and booksellers who have courageously printed, distributed, sold, and displayed "Satanic Verses" despite the threats they have received;

(4) applauds President Bush for his strongly worded statement of outrage against the Iranian government's actions and calls upon the President to continue to condemn publicly any and all threats made against the author and his publishers;

(5) commends the European Community member states for withdrawing their diplomatic corps from Iran in response to the Ayatollah's death sentences;

(6) recognizes the sensitivity of religious beliefs and practices, respects all religions and the commitment of the religious to their faith, and repudiates religious intolerance and bigotry, and

(7) calls upon the President of the United States to take swift and proportionate action in consulation, as appropriate, with other interested governments, in the event that violent acts should occur.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL ARBOR DAY

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, in 1970, 1972, and again last year, Congress legislated, and the President proclaimed the last Friday in April as "National Arbor Day." I am pleased that the Senate voted unanimously today to pass legislation I introduced to proclaim the last Friday in April 1989 as National Arbor Day.

Trees are one of our Nation's most important natural resources. They provide the raw materials for our basic industries, stabilize our environment, and add natural grace to our surroundings. The establishment of a National Arbor Day reminds all our citizens of the vital presence of trees, whether in urban areas or in distant wilderness.

Man's impact on the environment and on the future of our planet is increasingly evident. The importance of trees as a natural resource should compel us to act promptly on the problem of forest decline. Scientists have observed declines, serious damage, and death of a number of species of trees in large areas of Europe and the United States. Damage to forests has ranged from decline in growth of several species of pine in southern New Jersey to widespread damage to the ponderosa pine in southern California.

Because we are concerned about damage to our forests and our trees and because we need to acknowledge the contribution that trees make to our health and well-being, I urge the House of Representatives to act to proclaim April 28, 1989 as National Arbor Day.●

THE PASSING OF DR. IRVIN ABELL

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to express my sorrow upon the death of a community leader and good friend of mine, Dr. Irvin Abell.

When Irvin passed away on January 31, the community of Louisville and the State of Kentucky lost a selfless, dedicated doctor whose contributions to the community included a career in medicine which spanned several decades. He was a former president of the Kentucky State Medical Association and former head of the Jefferson County Medical Society. Irvin also served as president of the medical staff and the executive committee at the old St. Joseph Infirmary. Other medical organizations with which he was affiliated include the American College of Surgeons, Southeastern Surgical Congress, Southern Surgical Association, and the Kentucky Surgical Society.

But Irvin's duties did not exclusively center around the medical profession. He was a former board member of J.B. Speed Art Museum and a former director of the Louisville Chamber of Commerce. Irvin was also deeply interested in education having served on the board of overseers of Bellarmine College and as chairman of the board of advisers for Nazareth College.

Irvin Abell was a great man and a dedicated doctor who will be sorely missed by all who knew him and by all who benefited from his service to others. Mr. President, I know that my colleagues join me in sending our most sincere condolences to Irvin's widow, Helen, his children and grandchildren.

END HOLDING PATTERN

● Mr. MACK. Mr. President, the dispute between Eastern Airlines and the International Association of Machinists is having severe consequences for not only Eastern and its employees, but for the entire airline industry. A recent editorial in the Miami Herald examined this dispute, and, I believe, shed some light on the issue, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Miami Herald, Feb. 24, 1989]

END HOLDING PATTERN

Contract negotiations between Eastern Airlines and the International Association of Machinists (IAM) officially are in a "cooling off" stage in which intense negotiations are waged in search of agreement. Unofficially, both parties are in a sweat, running to court, to Congress, and "concerned citizens" in search of allies for what comes after March 4, the deadline for agreement. If only each would devote as much energy to negotiations.

The stakes are high: Losing $1 million a day, Eastern must reduce its costs and gain financial flexibility if it's to survive. Quite aside from the bitter and personal battle between IAM President Charles Bryan and Frank Lorenzo, chairman of Eastern's parent Texas Air Corp., organized labor worries that a new industry standard is emerging. Still, the self-interest of each is best served by a contract agreement. To a wary traveling public and a South Florida community held hostage to the dispute, the distinction between the IAM's strike threat and Eastern's self-fulfilling prophesies of service cuts and asset sales is irrelevant.

South Florida's business community and political establishment should continue pressuring both disputants to reach a negotiated accord. To that end, give credit to Labor Secretary Elizabeth Dole for avoiding the trap laid by the AFL-CIO's executive council and for parrying its proposals to establish an emergency Presidential fact-finding board to intervene.

While negotiations proceed, there is no justification whatsoever to convene a board, which would require extending the negotiating deadline another 60 days. Even if negotiations fail, the nation's air service wouldn't likely be disrupted seriously by an IAM strike, or even Eastern's collapse. Other airlines are willing to expand. Presidential intervention simply would alleviate pressure on Eastern and the IAM to reach accord by March 4.

There has been too much delay already. Eastern's ebbing financial strength is dragging Texas Air down as well. Thousands of union jobs have been lost. Hopes for a buyout have proved unrealistic. Now is the time for a contract agreement, not for naming a Presidential board and giving the negotiators another two months to squabble.●

ADVANCED MANUFACTURING TECHNOLOGIES

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, throughout the 1980's, we have been engaging in an ongoing debate as to how the Government can help American business improve its competitiveness in the global market. This is a difficult and complex issue which will not be quickly resolved.

As part of this debate, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent article written by William C. Norris, chairman emeritus of Control Data Corp. and current chairman of the William C. Norris Institute, a nonprofit corporation established to address major public policy issues. In this article, Bill points out the importance of facilitating public-private cooperation in developing advanced manufacturing technologies.

He specifically recommends that Federal and State governments pool their resources with private companies to establish a network of manufacturing service centers throughout the United States to provide design and manufacturing services on a contract basis. As he notes, "this approach would surmount the barriers to adoption of advanced manufacturing technology, especially by small companies."

Mr. President, I believe Bill Norris has presented an idea that we should consider pursuing in the near future. I ask that the article published in the February 23, 1989, St. Paul Pioneer Dispatch be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

U.S. GOVERNMENT, INDUSTRY MUST JOIN FORCES TO MEET FOREIGN CHALLENGE

(By William C. Norris)

A spate of articles has appeared in the nation's newspapers and business magazines in recent months, prompted by a Department of Commerce report that American manufacturing is not as healthy as had been claimed. Apparently, previous statistics on manufacturing contained a miscalculation causing that sector's share of gross national product to be overstated.

This revelation has come as a shock to many, because, for a number of years, economists and the Reagan administration had contended that U.S. manufacturing was in robust health. This position has been maintained, in spite of an ever-expanding and highly visible array of foreign-made consumer electronic goods, automobiles, trucks and other products pouring into our businesses, homes and onto our streets.

Also largely ignored has been a continuing stream of reports during the past five years warning that many U.S. industries have fallen behind foreign competitors in use of advanced manufacturing technology. That includes computer-aided design, computer-aided manufacturing and robotic assembly.

As the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment noted in a July report: "Many U.S. industries have fallen behind foreign competitors in manufacturing technology. The weak performance of American manufacturers is one of the most important underlying forces behind the large trade deficit of the 1980s. The United Statees has to improve its manufacturing performance if it is to prevent further erosion in living standards."

Another reason for great concern is the strong shift toward higher value-added products by Japanese manufacturers who are increasingly investing in advanced automated manufacturing to expand production of high-value products—such as computers, peripherals, instruments, VCRs, televison sets, and optical fiber telecommunications equipment—as compared to lower value-added steel, chemical feedstock, pulp, paper, pork bellies and other commodities.

As a consequence of the ever-growing investment in manufacturing technology, Japanese manufacturers have increased quality and lowered the cost of products. At the same time, they are decreasing the time required to design and manufacture new products.

Countering this formidable threat is a gargantuan challenge. Our response must be designed not just to catch up, but to leapfrog foreign competition. Clearly, a substantial increase in investment to improve manufacturing is required. Because of the staggering federal budget deficit and the many other demands for increased expenditures, such an investment is unaffordable unless there is a substantial increase in the efficiency of utilization of existing resources through cooperation on an unprecedented scale. This must involve the federal government, state government, local communities and industry in a cooperative effort.

The most effective means of marshaling these players is by establishing advanced manufacturing service centers throughout the United States, which would use the most advanced technology. These centers would provide design and manufacturing services on a contract basis. Companies would pay for the service as used. A company could access the manufacturing center through a computer work station located on its premises.

The centers would be financed, initially, by a combination of federal, state, local community and industry funds. Eventually, the centers would be taken over by industry.

This approach would surmount the barriers to adoption of advanced manufacturing technology, especially by smaller companies, of substantial initial investment, high risk and lack of the capability to assemble and operate an in-house advanced manufacturing system.

Congress has recognized the need to stimulate and accelerate the adoption of advanced manufacturing technology throughout American industry by providing a modest amount of funding—which is matched by other public and private sources—for three regional advanced manufacturing centers. While this is a step in the right direction, much larger funding needs to be provided by the federal government, which is keyed to increased investment by state governments, communities and companies.

Every community in America is uneasy about the foreign competitive threat. The steady flow of words relating to the health of U.S. manufacturing, often conflicting, has dwelled on symptoms. Identifying and effecting a cure is overdue. American communities must now provide the impetus to get it under way. This is in keeping with their actions to help themselves by establishing economic development programs.

Thus, each community should start the necessary planning and start building the necessary support required by federal and state governments and companies to establish an advanced manufacturing service center. Such actions, by communities throughout America, would dramatically improve competitiveness, which would help underwrite the prosperity we are all seeking for the future.●

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I ask my colleagues in the Senate to join me in recognizing an outstanding Alabamian, Mike L. Ward, of Huntsville, AL. If the future of this country rests with our young people, Mike should give us all hope. I can not think of a more appropriate time to recognize Mike's achievements than Black History Month.

I first met Mike in July 1988 when he visited my office as Governor of Boy's State and a delegate to Boy's Nation. I found him to be a highly motivated and well rounded individual who had succeeded in being elected the first black Governor of Alabama's Boys' State.

Mike embodies many characteristics that have set him apart as a leader. Born in 1971 with cerebral palsy, he, through hard work and determination, became an outstanding student with the potential to become one of tomorrow's leaders.

A senior at Butler Senior High School, Mike also was elected junior and senior class president and is an active member in the student council. He is an associate editor of the Phoenix magazine, a member of the Key Club, the Junior Civitan Club, the wrestling team, and the debate team, and has participated in the Scholars Bowl for the past 2 years. Further, Mike hosts a weekly radio show on WEUP in Huntsville on academics and sports at Butler High School. In addition to his unparalleled involvement in school activities, Mike' commitment to his community extends into the realm of civic and charitable endeavors. He is a member of the Pentecostal Church, a member of Visions 2000, which is an organization that works with the mayor of Huntsville on community problems, and a member of the Huntsville City School Boards Committee on Race Relations. He volunteers with the Special Olympics and Salvation Army, is an advisor to Boy Scout troops in Huntsville and conducts seminars on "growing up." Sanford University in Birmingham, Auburn University, Vanderbilt University, or Duke University, Mike's choices for college will benefit from this young man's outstanding leadership abilities in the fall.

Mike's endless participation in school has provided Butler Senior High with respected leadership. He has been a source of pride for his school and the State of Alabama, giving Huntsville the opportunity to add yet another outstanding citizen to that city's history.

He embodies the characteristics that idenfify our American spirit—faith, courage, and determination. I am honored to serve as his Senator in Washington.●

SILVER ANNIVERSARY OF THE PORT AUTHORITY OF PITTSBURGH

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to mark a historic milestone in the economic development of Allegheny County, PA, and the mobility of its citizens. Tomorrow, March 1, the Port Authority of Pittsburgh [PAT] will celebrate 25 years of service.

From its modest beginning on March 1, 1964, when a bus left the Homewood Garage on Frankstown Avenue to begin service to the North Side and Bloomfield, until today, PAT has provided direct benefits to billions of commuters, schoolchildren, and the elderly.

During the past quarter century, PAT has traveled nearly 1 billion miles and carried more than 2.4 billion passengers.

Mr. President, the port authority and its nearly 3,000 employees are to be commended for the contributions they have made toward our region's economic and social development. Mass transit is an integral part of our Nation's commercial well-being. It relieves traffic congestion and makes our environment a more livable one by reducing the number of cars needed to get people around. For many people, it is the only available means of transportation.

The port authority could not have gone so far, so fast, without the Federal transit funding provided through the Urban Mass Transportation administration. I stand committed to this Federal-State-local partnership which has demonstrably proven its value to our citizens.●

AMMUNITION CONTROL AND HANDGUN VIOLENCE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it has happened again. The New York Post reported on February 22 that a 17-year-old girl was arrested at Paul Robeson High School in Brooklyn, NY, for threatening a classmate with a loaded pistol. The pistol was loaded with .32 caliber bullets. Big enough to be deadly. And small enough to have been hidden in the girl's waistband.

On January 25, I introduced the Violent Crime Protection Crime Act—S. 229—in the Senate to ban the manufacture, importation, and sale of .25- and .32-caliber ammunition. I did so because it will be next to impossible to control handgun violence by banning handguns themselves. Sixty million handguns are already in circulation, and they will last more than a lifetime. But bullets get used up. Our current supply of bullets will not last for more than a few years.

The .25- and .32-caliber ammunition is used in small, concealable handguns. It is overwhelmingly the choice of criminals. It is just used to kill people. Children use it to kill children. On January 23, for example, in Fairfax County, VA, an 8-year-old boy shot his 6-year-old sister to death. Deliberately, with a .32-caliber handgun. On January 11, in New York City, a 5-year-old brought a .25-caliber pistol to kindergarten. He was headlined by the New York Post as New York's "Pistol Packin' Peewee."

I do not wish to argue that it is the presence of guns and bullets alone that causes this kind of violence. Life has become desperate in our cities. In New York City officials estimate that 600,000 mostly young people use crack. And in the South Bronx 1 in 40 expectant mothers tests positive for the AIDS virus. The same people who are shooting at one another are slowly killing themselves. We must learn how to teach them the simple proposition that life is worth holding on to.

But that will take time. In the meantime, we could just save a few lives by cutting off the exhaustible supply of bullets that feeds our inexhaustible supply of handguns. To repeat: it has happened again. And it will happen again. I urge my colleagues to take another look at S. 229, and to do it sooner rather than later. We simply cannot delay action any longer.

AMERICAN POLICIES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, about 2 weeks ago, Vice President QUAYLE delivered a speech to the Anti-Defamation League that offered a clear and courageous exposition of the principles that will guide American policies in the Middle East. The Vice President reminded his listeners that in the blizzard of rhetoric and showmanship which has recently come from this volatile area of the world, the United States must wait for the verbal storm to pass and look carefully for tangible deeds on the part of the Palestine Liberation Organization before it judges both the sincerity and the reality of Yasser Arafat's attitude toward the State of Israel.

"We need," the Vice President noted, "more than press conference statements and semantics. We need to see real evidence of concrete actions by the PLO—actions for peace, and against terrorism—before changing our fundamental attitude toward the PLO." If we read between Arafat's own lines, Mr. President, we still see a man representing a group that continues to rely on violence and subversion to achieve its goals. The PLO "denounces terrorism," we are told, yet still reserves a right to kidnap, kill, and bomb within Israeli borders. Palestinian spokesmen "accept Israel's right to exist," we hear on the evening news, yet the charter of their organization still calls for the destruction of the Jewish state. Arafat seeks a "genuine compromise" on the future status of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, we read in the papers, yet still promises "10 bullets in the chest" to anyone who dares to disagree with his program of guerrilla warfare.

It is unfortunate that the Vice President's speech attracted so little attention in the media because it tackled these hard facts concerning the PLO's agenda and recommended sober policy options for the new administration. I therefore ask, Mr. President, that the text of this speech be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT TO THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE, PALM BEACH, FL

I am delighted to be here this afternoon and to address this distinguished gathering. Since its founding in a Chicago law office back in 1913, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith has worked hard to make the American dream a reality for all Americans. You have sought, in your own words, "to stop the defamation of the Jewish people . . . and to secure justice and fair treatment to all citizens alike." These are great aims, noble aims, and I congratulate you for the courage, wisdom and tenacity with which you have pursued them.

The A.D.L.'s record infighting the good fight is a long and honorable one, but there's one aspect of that record that seems to me especially noteworthy: Your recognition that for civil rights to flourish at home, they must flourish abroad, as well. From the 1930's, when the A.D.L. fought Nazi propaganda in the United States, to your current efforts to develop lesson plans for schools that teach our students to distinguish between democratic and totalitarian forms of government, you have understood that the cause of democracy and human rights is indivisible. You have understood that you can't fight the bigots and the bullies at home while running away from them abroad. You have understood that you've got to stand up and be counted—both in the domestic arena and in the foreign arena.

I am here to tell you that the Bush Administration shares your basic outlook. At home, our aim is to strengthen the pluralistic threads out of which our society is woven—to build a "kinder, gentler nation," a nation where racism, anti-Semitism and bigotry of every sort no longer deface the American landscape. Abroad, our goal is to use our power to advance the cause of liberty. We know that these two aims are linked, and we recognize that we won't succeed at either task unless we succeed at both.

Maintaining liberty at home means honoring the values that have made us free. I stressed this need only a few days after becoming Vice President, when I addressed the National Religious Broadcasters Convention back in Washington. My theme was religious liberty, and the need for all Americans to respect our First Amendment Freedoms.

In the course of my remarks, I used one of my favorite quotations—from a letter sent by George Washington to the Hebrew Congress of Newport in 1790. It goes like this: "It is now no more that toleration is spoken of, as if it was by the indulgence of one class of people, that another enjoyed the exercise of their inherent natural rights. For happily the government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens, in giving it on all occasions their effectual support . . . May the Children of the Stock of Abraham, who dwell in this land, continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants, while every one shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid."

That was the quote I read to the Religious Broadcasters, and it truly is one of the most beautiful quotes in our history. For it reminds us that at the very moment when the foundations of our nation were being laid, Americans understood that religious freedom isn't a privilege that the state can grant or withhold as it chooses; rather, it is a fundamental right, an inalienable right, that the state must uphold.

Of course, we Americans haven't always lived up to our high ideals. Our history has been marred by racism and anti-Semitism, and even today incidents occur. But these are the exception, not the rule. The rule is that the American people are deeply devoted to the principles of a democratic, just and pluralistic society. And the rule is that the Bush Administration—from the President on down—abhors and abominates all manifestations of racial and religious bigotry. Although reasonable men and women will differ over just where to draw the line between religion and the state in public affairs, there is no room to differ over the centrality of liberty, and of religious liberty. There is no differences over the need to keep America a nation where, "Every one shall sit in safety under his vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid."

I wish it were so everywhere else in the world—but, unfortunately, it is not. As some of you may know, I just got back from a visit to Venezuela and El Salvador. Over the course of my trip, I met with many Latin American leaders. To all these leaders, I stressed this nation's enduring support for democracy and human rights. I explained to them that our democratic convictions aren't just an afterthought or an add-on; rather, they lie at the core of our foreign policy. For the American people as a whole—for Democrats and Republicans, for Jews and Christians—democratic self-government is the best guarantee of peace and freedom, of international stability and social justice.

This national consensus on behalf of democracy is one very important reason why the United States supports democratic Israel, but it's not the only reason. I'd like to examine some of the other reasons as well. But first, let me review with you some of the recent developments in the Middle East—developments with which the Bush Administration is currently grappling.

One very troubling recent development is the proliferation of both chemical weapons and ballistic missiles throughout the Middle East. The use of chemical weapons by both Iraq and Iran during the Gulf War, Iraq's use of these weapons against the Kurds, and Libya's possession of chemical weapons, remind us all, once again, that the Middle East is an exceedingly dangerous place—and that the dangers may be increasing.

Another recent development has been Yasir Arafat's acceptance of American conditions for initiating a dialogue—that is, recognition of Israel's right to exist, renunciation of terrorism, and acceptance of UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. But there are many reasons for looking long and hard before drawing any firm conclusions about Mr. Arafat's reversal. We need more than press conference statements and semantics. We need to see real evidence of concrete actions by the PLO—actions for peace, and against terrorism—before changing our fundamental attitude toward the PLO.

To begin with, we must all remember that the PLO is an umbrella organization that contains a number of political groups. Some of these groups have made it clear that they continue to reject Israel's right to exist, and continue to regard terrorism as a legitimate means of struggle, regardless of what Mr. Arafat says. Clearly, then, the nature of the PLO's commitment to peace needs to be clarified.

Second, even within Mr. Arafat's own organization, some of his lieutenants have made statements that flatly contradict their leader's peaceful protestations—yet they are neither censured nor disciplined for their apparent insubordination. What are we to make of this? And what are we to make of the fact that Mr. Arafat himself has threatened the lives of Palestinian leaders on the West Bank who have indicated an interest in achieving some sort of peaceful accommodation with Israel? Or of the fact that the PLO Charter, calling for Israel's destruction, has not been formally revoked? Once again, simple prudence obliges us to monitor Mr. Arafat and his organization very carefully, and to probe his words very closely, before arriving at a final determination. Those who believe that America policy is about to undergo a basic shift merely because we have begun to talk with the PLO are completely mistaken. As Secretary of State Baker has noted, "The existence of the dialogue should not lead anyone to misunderstand our overall policy or question our enduring support for the State of Israel."

Yet another new factor in the Middle East equation is the Palestinian uprising that has gone on for over a year now, and has resulted in nearly four hundred Palestinians killed, and many more injured. Some may say that by the grisly standards of some of Israel's neighbors, a few hundred people killed in the course of a year-long uprising is not a very staggering figure. And, of course, Arab states have killed far more Palestinians than Israel has. But Israel cannot be judged by the standards of its neighbors. Israel judges itself—and is judged by others—on the basis of the standards which prevail in the democratic West. And on the basis of these standards, the status quo on the West Bank and Gaza Strip is clearly unacceptable.

Of course the Israelis understand this as well as anyone. As you know, the recently-formed government in Jerusalem is exploring new options, examining new initiatives to deal with this crisis. We welcome these moves, and hope that they will lead to an atmosphere of mutual restraint. And we will continue to oppose the one-sided condemnations of Israel's actions that emerge all-too-often from the U.N. In fact, in its very first week on the job, the Bush Administration made it clear that we would veto a proposed Security Council Presidential statement harshly critical of Israel. When the sponsors of that statement toned it down somewhat, in the hope of avoiding a U.S. veto, we again informed them that it was still one-sided and unacceptable. As a result, the statement was withdrawn. There's a lesson to be learned here—a lesson about the U.S. commitment to the truth and justice in the Middle East—and we hope that those who sponsored this statement have learned it.

These, then, are some of the complexities facing the Bush Administration as we review U.S. policy in the Middle East. Clearly, the dilemmas are real, the choices are difficult, and the stakes are high. But the fact that a policy review is under way doesn't mean that our Middle East policy is somehow up for grabs now. On the contrary, the broad principles of U.S. Middle East policy remain firmly in place. And perhaps, during this period of review, they are worth restating.

So let's begin with the basics. The first principles of U.S. Middle East policy remains strong and unwavering support for Israel's security. Forty years ago, we supported the creation of the State of Israel for moral and humanitarian reasons. We believed that after the unspeakable atrocities committed by the Nazis, Jews needed a land they could call their own, a land in which they could live without fear. That is what we are committed, and will always remain committed to the security of Israel. We are committed to helping Israel protect itself against any combination of aggressors. And we will always make clear to the world, through moral and material support, that we are a permanent and unshakable ally of the State of Israel.

But humanitarian and moral considerations are not the sole basis for American support of Israel. As I noted earlier, our common democratic traditions, our partnership in pursuit of peace and freedom, is another pillar of our alliance. Israel is a vibrant democracy in a part of the world where democratic institutions have not, as yet, taken hold. This situation presents Israel's democracy with daily challenges of a kind that other democracies, surrounded by peaceful neighbors, have rarely had to face. That Israel's democracy continues to flourish under these conditions is both a tribute to the courage and determination of the Israeli people, and a bond firmly linking them to the American people.

American and Israel are also linked by common strategic interests. The fact is that we have no more reliable friend in the world than Israel. And the scope of our strategic cooperation is vast. Indeed, as Secretary of State Baker pointed out during his confirmation hearings, our relationship with Israel has expanded into a "true strategic alliance" during the Reagan-Bush years. One aspect of this alliance of particular interest to me when I served in the Senate was anti-tactical ballistic missile technology. With the proliferation of ballistic missiles to the Middle East, the need for such a defense becomes increasingly obvious. I am proud that I helped to channel funds to Israel through SDI for joint research and development projects, such as the Arrow missile defense system, and that I have worked to further U.S.-Israel strategic cooperation both in the Senate and during my visit to Israel in 1987. I know that both nations can gain enormously from such cooperation.

For all these reasons—our moral commitments, our democratic convictions, and our strategic interests—we provide more security assistance to Israel than to any other nation. I believe that this assistance is one of the best investments we can make—an investment not only in Israel's security, but in our own. And I know President Bush shares this conviction.

A second enduring principle underlying U.S. Middle East policy is the search for an Arab-Israeli peace based on direct negotiations between the parties. We believe that negotiations can work. We believe that the Arab-Israeli conflict is not intractable, and that compromises on all outstanding issues can be found. But the responsibility for making the compromises, for finding the solutions, rests with the parties themselves. Anyone who tries to shift the primary peace-making responsibility to the United States, who thinks that we can somehow be persuaded into pressuring Israel to accept a pre-cooked "solution", is only kidding himself.

A third enduring principle of our Middle East policy is that direct negotiations must be based on U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which include the exchange of territory for peace. Realistically, we believe that Jordan must play a part in any peace settlement. The Palestinians must participate in the determination of their own future, as well. We continue to believe, however, that an independent Palestinian state will not be a source of stability or a contribution to a just and lasting peace.

My friends, we should not lose sight during the current difficulties and turmoil of the fact that the last eight years have been good ones for the American-Israeli alliance. They have also been years in which the cause of democracy and human rights have made giant strides around the world. These two developments are not unrelated. For when America is truest to herself, when she takes her own principles seriously, and acts on them, both democracy and our friendship with Israel will flourish.

I want to assure you that the next eight years—the Bush-Quayle years—will be equally successful. We will continue to uphold the values of freedom and democracy that have made us great both at home and abroad. We will continue to advance the cause of human rights around the world. And we will continue to strengthen and deepen our strategic alliance with Israel.

Let me conclude these remarks on a personal note, if I might. As some of you may know, I was born in Huntington, Indiana. It was a small, decent, quiet American town—and life was safe and secure there. But then I grew up, and as I grew up I learned some new and ugly words; words like Gulag; words like Auschwitz; words like Boat People. And I learned that the safety and security that I had taken for granted were not part of the inevitable order of things. You have to work at it; you have to fight for it; and sometimes, you have to sacrifice for it.

I went into public life to do precisely this: to help, in the words of our Constitution, "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." But securing these blessings for ourselves means helping others to secure them for themselves—their posterity. It means working at home and abroad to make the world a little less cruel, a little more humane.

The A.D.L. has understood this all along. From your earliest days you have been an embattled organization, and all your battles have been fought on behalf of democracy and human rights. I salute you for what you have accomplished. And I trust that in the future we shall fight our battles together, side by side.

Thank you and God Bless You.●

TERRY EHRICH

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment today to talk about a constituent of mine, Terry Ehrich, of Bennington, VT, who is the owner and publisher of a newspaper called the Hemmings Motor News.

Terry also provides a great public service by allowing his antique cars to be used during Bennington's local parades. I have certainly enjoyed them.

No matter where my travels take me, I can usually find a copy of the Hemmings Motor News, and I take great pride in knowing that the publication comes from Vermont.

I respectfully request that the article about my friend Terry that appeared in the Burlington Free Press be printed here in full.

The article follows:

IF YOU CAN'T FIND IT IN HEMMINGS—BENNINGTON'S THE HUB FOR SPECIALTY CAR ENTHUSIASTS

(By Kent M. Shaw)

BENNINGTON.—Can anyone help T. Hillsgrove, of Jacksonville, Fla., locate 16-inch rims with 3½-inch hubs for his 1940 Buick 46S Coupe?

"I have two rims that are bent so badly that I can hardly drive the car," laments T. Hillsgrove. "I've come to the conclusion that if I can't find it in Hemmings it probably doesn't exist. Can anyone help?"

However the writer makes out in his quest for a smooth ride in his '40 Buick, there may be no better place to look than among the 700-plus pages of Hemmings Motor News, the monthly Bible of vintage and special interest automobiles, parts and sundries published from a much-expanded schoolhouse in Bennington.

In 1988, Hemmings published 8,384 pages of classified and display advertising. Except for the occasional note from the publisher and the small string of letters, such as T. Hillsgrove's, there was nothing else.

No feature stories, no in-depth investigations, no chit chat, no profiles, not a word on the latest trends or fashions.

T-Bird: 1956, in storage 21 years, needs very minor work, $16,000.

We pay cash for Chrysler convertibles, 1928-68, any condition; 1963 Super Sport spinner wheel covers, excellent condition, $80.

There is no price listed with a 1955 Mercedes-Benz 300SL Gullwing, "available to qualified knowledgeable drivers."

At last count, says publisher Terry Ehrich, who is planning to celebrate Hemmings' 35th anniversary through most of 1988, circulation had reached 269,935, including newsstand sales of about 44,350 at the cover price of $3.95.

The flagship of Watering Inc., a privately held corporation of which Ehrich is a principal owner, Hemmings will account for about $13.5 million in revenues this year.

"There are a lot of fun cars in here," said the 47-year-old Ehrich, paging at random through a recent issue. "You can open it up and start daydreaming."

"Look at this old Ford woodie," he said. "Imagine driving across the country in that."

This one was a 1949 with 75,000 miles on it, "near perfect wood throughout, original upholstery, $8,900."

Ehrich has a much simpler time explaining how his business works than addressing the fundamental questions, explaining why it is that T. Hillsgrove or any of 100,000 other dedicated Hemmings readers develop, in Ehrich's words, such "emotional relationships" with their cars.

"People really get involved with their automobiles," he said, smiling.

Ehrich's involvement with Hemmings began in 1968 when he purchased the business from Ernest Hemmings, an auto parts jobber from Quincy, Ill., who mimeographed the first Hemmings—four pages long—in January 1954.

Ehrich moved the business to his native Vermont two years later, bringing along a few adventurous staffers and a publication with a circulation of about 35,000.

Brownell, who is also editor of Special Interest Autos—a Watering Inc.-owned magazine established in 1970, which publishes frank test drive reports on vintage cars—says the 1970s saw the pastime of refurbishing classic cars shift away from the near exclusive domain of millionaires who tinker with their Dusenbergs.

"The hobby redefined itself," Brownwell said. "These are regular folks. These are average Joes."

That isn't to say that Hemmings turns down ads from would-be sellers or buyers of Dusenbergs or Ferraris or 1955 Mercedes-Benz 300SL Gullwings. But the mainstay is the regular production American car—the V-8 powered 1930s Fords, the 1960s-era Mustangs.

Hemmings does turn down ads from people who forget to enclose a check or money order with their insert for any of the 60 or so categories inside. There is no billing department at Hemmings. The magazine also gives a boost to the average Joe by discounting non-commercial classified advertising for hobbyists.

Even when he doesn't have much in the way of spare time to share with a visitor, Ehrich is eager to show off the firm's "rolling stock," most of it housed in the former horse stables of a once-grand Bennington estate.

Hemmings Motor News is emblazoned on the sides of two 1929 Model AA Ford-Cretor popcorn vending trucks, which the firm takes along to auto shows for proven promotional value.

The regular fleet of 1936 panel trucks—a Chevy, a Ford and a Dodge—are there, too, restored to prime shape. Ehrich said he liked the idea of investing in the less-sought after panel trucks because few readers would feel Hemmings was competing against them in the market. Besides, said Ehrich, smiling again, there is plenty of room on the rich British racing green side panels for the company name.

"If you can't find it in Hemmings Motor News," reads a borrowed phrase on the back, "your car can probably do without it."

Ehrich said he may have learned something recently of the passions of vintage car collectors while he was preparing an introductory essay for a small publication Hemmings plans for 1989, a primer for the would-be collector.

"I think I convinced myself," said Ehrich, who found himself smitten by a 1928 Model A two-door recently.

"Because it was just the same as the first car I ever owned."

Just the same as the car he tinkered with as a teen-ager at a former Shell station in Arlington, just up the road a piece.

FAIR HOUSING MONTH

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to offer my support for Senate Joint Resolution 41, a joint resolution designating April 1989 as "Fair Housing Month."

Twenty-one years ago, in April 1968, Congress passed the Fair Housing Act. Fair Housing Month commemorates this landmark in civil rights history, and reaffirms our national commitment to providing fair housing to everyone regardless of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, familial status, or handicap. Just last year, to further our commitment to fair housing, Congress passed the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988, of which I was proud to cosponsor. The 1988 amendments expanded the Fair Housing Act to include coverage to prevent discrimination against handicapped persons and families with children.

Among its more important provisions, the Fair Housing Amendments Act bars discrimination in the sale, rental, or financing of housing on the basis of handicap. In addition, the amendments require reasonable modification of dwellings and reasonable accommodation in policies for handicap persons, and also requires the design and construction of certain new covered multifamily dwellings for first occupancy after March 13, 1991, to meet certain adaptability and accessibility requirements. Regarding discrimination against families, the 1988 amendments bar discrimination in the sale, rental, or financing of housing because there are children in a family, but exempts certain housing for older persons.

Mr. President, housing is a basic human right. So it is our duty to protect anyone denied housing because of race, number of children, handicap, or any other reason. America was founded on principles of fairness and equality—it is vital that we protect those in danger of losing these rights. I am proud to cosponsor Fair Housing Month which reminds us not to lose sight of our American values. I commend Senator SPECTER, my neighbor from nearby Pennsylvania, on introducing this joint resolution, and urge my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 41.●

BIOLOGICAL AND CHEMICAL WEAPONS SANCTIONS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to have recently joined as a cosponsor of legislation introduced by Senator CLAIBORNE PELL to impose economic sanctions against nations that use biological or chemical weapons. The Pell bill is an important step toward deterring the appalling use of these weapons, even by those who are not signators of international treaties that prohibit their use.

Last month, the ugly specter of chemical weapons brought 149 nations together at a conference in Paris. The participants reaffirmed their support for the Geneva protocol, an international agreement banning the use of chemical weapons, and urged the completion of a treaty to ban their production or possession.

Mr. President, I found the Paris conference full of irony. It was as if people finally came to their senses about the dangerous path the world was heading down. President Reagan, the leader who appealed to other governments to hold the meeting, successfully urged Congress only several years earlier to resume production of chemical weapons. I fought hard against this unwise initiative but the President prevailed. If these horrible weapons are going to continue to exist we should deter their use by showing other countries their effects can be negated, not that we will retaliate with similar weapons. The United States should take a bold step and concentrate its efforts on defensive rather than offensive capabilities.

I also found it ironic that some of the nations accused of using chemical weapons attended the conference and signed the nonuse pact. I doubt that nations which have already used chemical weapons are in any way restrained by a nonuse pledge. It will take strong measures by the international community against violators if we are to deter further use of these inhumane and senseless weapons.

On several occasions during the Iran-Iraq war, United Nations inspectors determined chemical weapons were used. Shortly after a cease-fire was reached, Iraq apparently used chemical weapons again, this time against Kurdish rebels and civilians. Several credible reports also indicate the Soviet Union resorted to chemical weapons during its failed campaign against the Mujaheddin in Afghanistan. There are also reports that Vietnam used chemical weapons in Cambodia.

In 1979 there was a very disturbing incident in Sverdlovsk, U.S.S.R. Apparently, an accident at a biological warfare facility released anthrax spores into the environment resulting in illness and death among the local community. This accident strongly suggests that the Soviet Union violated the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention that bans both use and possession of these weapons.

Mr. President, the United States and its allies strongly condemned the use of biological and chemical weapons after many of these incidents. But strong words failed to keep the biological and chemical genies in their bottles. Last year, after the Iraqi chemical assault on the Kurds, the Senate finally moved closer to stronger measures by passing a sanctions bill against Iraq. Unfortunately, the House failed to take up this measure before the end of the 100th Congress.

The Pell legislation is an important opportunity to put nations on notice that the United States will react in more forceful terms to any future use of chemical weapons. The bill requires the President to impose sanctions if U.N. inspectors confirm their use. If a country denies entry to U.N. inspectors the sanctions would automatically be imposed.

Mr. President, almost as frightening as their use is the spread of these horrific weapons. Nearly 20 countries are now suspected of having chemical weapons. In addition to establishing international procedures to punish those who release chemical weapons, the United States must continue to work closely with all nations to promote the elimination of these weapons.●

MENTAL ILLNESS AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 55, a joint resolution designating the week of October 1-7, 1989, as Mental Illness Awareness Week. I commend my colleague from Illinois, Mr. SIMON, for taking the lead in this effort to focus public attention on the concerns surrounding mental illness and the advances that have been made in treating this disease.

The impact of mental illness is felt throughout our society. Every year, between 31 and 41 million Americans experience significant disability with respect to employment, attendance at school, or independent living as the result of a clearly diagnosable mental disorder. More than 10 million Americans are disabled for extended periods of time by schizophrenia, manic depressive disorder, and major depression. Mental illness is a major contributor to homelessness; it is estimated that between 30 and 50 percent of the homeless suffer from serious, chronic forms of mental illness. The elderly are particularly vulnerable to mental illness; nearly one-fourth of the elderly who are thought to be senile actually have treatable mental disorders. Mental illness also impairs the healthy development of as many as 12 million of our children. All told, mental illness costs our Nation $106.2 billion annually in health care expenses and lost productivity.

Fortunately, research in recent decades has led to a wide array of treatments for some of the most incapacitating forms of mental illness, including schizophrenia, major affective disorders, phobias, and phobic disorders. These treatments—which may be pharmacological, behavioral, or psychosocial—have been demonstrated to be highly effective. Nearly two-thirds of all mentally ill patients show significant signs of recovery with their initial treatment. Moreover, appropriate treatment of mental illness can result in restored productivity, reduced utilization of more costly medical services, and lessened social dependence—all of which help reduce the cost of mental illness to society.

By informing the public that mental illness is a disease—and that it can be treated—we can do much to diminish the fear and misunderstanding that commonly surrounds this disease. I commend Mr. SIMON for drawing attention to this disease and for recognizing the role of research in helping us to understand and treat mental illness. I encourage my colleagues to support this joint resolution, and I urge its immediate passage.●

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., HOLIDAY COMMISSION

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator NUNN as one of the 29 original cosponsors of S. 431, a bill that would reauthorize the Martin Luthur King, Jr., Holiday Commission. Under the bill, the Holiday Commission, which was established in 1984 by Public Law 98-399, would be reauthorized for a period of 5 additional years. The enactment of this measure is necessary to ensure that the King Commission can continue its fine work in encouraging appropriate nationwide ceremonies relating to the annual observance of the holiday honoring Dr. King. It is indeed impressive that in the short period since its establishment, the Commission now coordinates special commemorative events in all 50 States and in more than 140 nations around the world. In addition, the Commission has also provided invaluable advice and assistance to Federal, State, and local governments, and to private organizations regarding the observance of the holiday.

As Senator NUNN noted when introducing this bill, the celebration of Dr. King's birthday provides a time for all Americans to reflect on the principles of racial equality and nonviolent social change espoused by Martin Luthur King, Jr. The Holiday Commission has played a particularly significant role in instructing the youth of our Nation on the importance of educational excellence, community service, and peace and justice. This significant work must continue.

Although the Commission has operated very effectively since its inception in 1984, it has done so with private donations and appropriate fundraising activities. However, Mr. President, the time has come for the Commission to receive a modest annual appropriation to continue its work. Even in these budget-conscious times, a $300,000 annual appropriation is a minimal amount of money. More importantly, the assurance of a Federal appropriation will enable the Commission to devote its time to carrying out its congressional mandate, rather than exerting and exhausting its energies on continual fundraising activities.

I am encouraged that more than a quarter of the Senate has joined in cosponsoring this worthy proposal. In addition, it is my understanding that President Bush has declared his support for a permanent King Holiday Commission. I am pleased this bill is being supported by the Bush administration.

As chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will consider S. 431, I will do everything possible to ensure the prompt review of this important bill.●

THE IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise to cosponsor S. 358, a bill introduced by Senators KENNEDY and SIMPSON to reform our legal immigration system. The Senate adopted identical legislation in the last session by an overwhelming vote of 88 to 4. That bill was the product of bipartisan compromise achieved in the Judiciary Committee. Unfortunately, the House did not consider it before the 100th Congress adjourned.

The authors of this legislation have attempted to structure a system that more accurately reflects our Nation's priorities for legal immigration. In addition to reaffirming the tradition of family reunification, the bill corrects an inequity in the present system and seeks to stimulate immigration among those with needed skills.

S. 358 establishes a national level of immigration within which all new permanent entrants would be counted. The cap for the first 3 years will be 590,000, 100,000 over current levels.

Within this ceiling, the bill creates two categories for preference immigrant visas: One for close family members, 470,000 and another for independent immigrants, 120,000. The family connection preference system is adjusted to give greatest priority to the closest family members.

The bill also provides an additional 30,000 visas for 3 years to reduce the existing backlog in the preference for brothers and sisters of adult U.S. citizens.

The new category for independent immigrants makes visas available to those with skills and to those with no family connections in the United States. The bill provides for an additional 55,000 visas, and the current preferences for professional and skilled workers is retained. Priority for the additional 55,000 visas will be established by a point system.

Our present immigration system emphasizes the very worthwhile goal of family reunification, therefore giving preference to the sons and daughters of U.S. citizens and to the spouses and unmarried sons and daughters of permanent resident aliens.

Unfortunately, it also creates painful, and even tragic problems for Irish, Germans, Italians, Poles, and others without immediate family members in the United States. Many such individuals have watched their dreams of becoming American citizens fade, and eventually die, because the years of large-scale immigration from these lands are long past.

S. 358 recognizes that these deserving people have been left out, in fact, inadvertently discriminated against, by the present system. The point system for visa priority set forth in the bill places heavy emphasis on education, English langauge skills, needed labor skills, and youth. Those who would thus be accorded priority under these standards are clearly well-equipped to make immediate and meaningful contributions as American citizens.

The creation of this category is a provision I strongly support. In working with this legislation, I intend to explore ways to make it even more comprehensive. Opening the gateway of opportunity to more of these deserving individuals could only enhance our productivity and vitality as a culture. Our Nation would be richly rewarded by the extraordinary talents, energy, motivation, and educational achievements of these would-be citizens.

I also support this bill's requirement that the administration review the social and economic effects of immigration on our country, and if necessary, propose revisions of the national level of immigration at least every 3 years.

I commend my colleagues, Senators SIMPSON and KENNEDY, for their persistence, leadership, and clear commitment in crafting this bipartisan reform to our legal immigration system.●

ESTONIANS AND LITHUANIANS CELEBRATE THEIR INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, February is an important month for Estonians and Lithuanians around the world. On February 16, Lithuanians celebrate their independence, while on February 24 it is the turn of the Estonians. This year is the first time that the Soviet authorities have permitted public celebrations of the independence of the pre-Soviet states of Estonia and Lithuania—in striking contrast to their previous behavior.

Many thousands of people in Estonia and Lithuania turned out to celebrate their independence, capping a remarkable year of public activism, involving hundreds of thousands of people, which sprang up in the Baltic States. The Soviets did not attempt to hinder the public expressions of the long-held Estonian and Lithuanian desire for freedom. Unfortunately, however, I must note that eight Lithuanian-Americans were denied—reportedly on Moscow's orders—Soviet visas to attend independence day celebrations. Such actions do not bode well for Soviet responses to visa requests for the Moscow human rights meeting in 1991.

The year 1988 will long be remembered in Estonia and Lithuania: Leading political prisoners, such as Enn Tarto, Viktoras Petkus, Mart Niklus, and Balys Gajauskas, were released after many years of imprisonment; new nationalist groups were formed, such as the Lithuanian Liberty League and the Estonian National Independence Party; the first mass political action organizations were founded: The Estonian Popular Front and Sajudis, the Lithuanian Movement to Support Perestroika.

Political activism in Estonia and Lithuania has gone even further than massive demonstrations and powerful new political organizations. The spirit of independence has spread to official bodies as well. In a brave defiant move, the Estonian Supreme Soviet voted to reject new constitutional amendments on the grounds that they would further restrict Estonian rights vis a vis the Kremlin. Although this effort was rebuffed, the Estonians continue to press for their program of legal reforms. And in Lithuania, Sajudis issued an independence day statement which in effect calls for eventual independence.

In conclusion, let me extend my congratulations to all Americans of Lithuanian and Estonian background on their independence days. I hope that recent events in the two proud countries of Estonia and Lithuania—as well as in Moscow—portend that history is moving toward greater human and national liberty in that part of the world.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 50, a joint resolution designating the week of April 2, 1989, as "National Child Care Awareness Week." I commend my colleague, Senator BOSCHWITZ, for helping to bring the problem of child care to national attention.

The composition of the American family is changing. Today, fewer than 10 percent of families are what was once considered the typical American family with the mother staying home and the father working. The upsurge in the number of women in the work force has been dramatic: In 1950 only 12 percent of women with children under age 6 worked, today, 57 percent do.

The family is the cornerstone of our Nation. Today's children, who will come of age in the 21st century, are our Nation's future. Many of them will have to overcome obstacles like broken homes, poverty, drugs, and troubled schools with high dropout rates. Studies show that early childhood intervention is the best hope for at risk children. We owe to these children the best in child care and must make it affordable to their parents.

Mr. President, this joint resolution highlights an issue of importance to millions of American families. I am encouraged by the emerging bipartisan commitment to finding a workable solution to the child care dilemma. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 50.●

MANUEL J. CORTEZ

● Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise before you today to commend one of the State of Nevada's finest citizens, Clark County commissioner, Manuel J. Cortez, whose impressive record of contributions to the southern Nevada community makes him a worthy recipient of the Third Annual New Mexico Club of Nevada Distinguished Award being bestowed upon him.

Born in Las Cruces, NM, and a resident of the State of Nevada since 1944, Commissioner Cortez has spent most of his adult life actively involved in the administration of Clark County. Prior to taking office in 1977 as county commissioner, Mr. Cortez was appointed to serve as the administrator of the Nevada Taxicab Authority. Previous to this appointment, he worked in both the Clark County Public Defender's Office and in the Clark County District Attorney's Office.

Manny is a former chairman and vice chairman of the county commission, and as a commissioner, also serves on the following boards: Las Vegas Valley District Board of Directors; University Medical Center Board of Trustees; vice chairman of the Clark County Liquor and Gaming Licensing Board; vice chairman of the Clark County Sanitation District Board of Trustees; Big Bend Water District Board of Trustees; Kyle Canyon Water District Board of Trustees; and chairman of the Las Vegas Convention and Visitors Authority.

A short list of some of Manny's past accomplishments include: President of the Nevada Association of County Commissioners; chairman of the Clark County Board of Commissioners; chairman of the Clark County Liquor and Gaming License Board; chairman of the Clark County Sanitation District Board of Trustees; vice chairman of the University Medical Center Board of Trustees; and vice chairman of the Metropolitan Police Committee on Fiscal Affairs.

Manny is also an active member in a variety of civic organizations, including: the Boys and Girls Clubs of Clark County and the Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Southern Nevada, among others. He also works closely with the Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, the Nevada Division of Aging, and Public Defender's Office on problems relating to senior citizens.

Besides his illustrious public service career, Manny and his wife Joanna have raised two fine children, Cynthia Ann and Catherine.

It is then with great honor and pleasure, Mr. President, that I commend this fine Nevada citizen, Clark County commissioner Manuel J. Cortez, as he receives the 1989 New Mexico Club of Nevada Distinguished Award.●

NAMIBIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCES

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I hope we will act quickly on the question of funding for Namibian peacekeeping forces of the United Nations.

But there is concern that I heard expressed when I was in Africa recently about the size of the U.N. force.

It has been tentatively reduced from 7,500 people to 4,500.

Namibia is a substantial country in size, approximately twice the size of California.

To assume that 4,500 people can adequately take care of the transition there, I hope is valid, but there are understandably deep concerns.

I ask to insert into the RECORD a letter from the church leaders of Namibia to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and a resolution that they adopted.

I urge my colleagues to read it, and I urge those in the administration of the United Nations to monitor this situation carefully so that if additional forces are needed, we move with those forces immediately.

The material follows:

[Telex]

From: Windhoek, Namibia, Routed VIA Namibia Communications, Centre, London.
Date: 16th January 1989.
To: The United Nations Security Council.
From: The Executive Committee of the Council of Churches in Namibia (CCN), representing over 900,000 Namibian Christians.

RETAIN UNTAG GROUP AT 7,500

We, the leaders of the Namibian churches, make a desperate and urgent plea to the members of the United Nations Security Council to retain the size of the United Nations Transitional Assistance Group at 7,500 and not to reduce it in any way.

Our plea is made desperate by our conviction that the independence process in Namibia will be seriously jeopardised if the UNTAG force is reduced.

Our conviction is based on our awareness of what is now happening in Namibia. We have strong reasons to believe that:

1. Arms are being cached at strategic places in Namibia by forces unfriendly to Namibian independence.

2. Some people in Namibia are being supplied with arms in order to destabilise the independence forces.

3. Young Namibians are not only being recruited but are being integrated into the present military groupings in Namibia. They are being subjected to anti-Namibian propaganda and training.

4. UNITA members are being issued with Namibian citizenship documents to enable them to vote against SWAPO.

5. The South West African radio and television services and the core government press are continually producing biased propaganda aimed at influencing the cause of elections in Namibia.

6. The South African military build-up is continuing in northern Namibia. Long convoys of army trucks are seen moving north even in Kavango. New 'police stations' are being built in Ovamboland with the South African flag flying higher.

7. Members of Koeovet, the brutal South African counter-insurgency force, are to be integrated into the regular police force.

8. Police and army forces are already campaigning for elections. They call people to meetings, offer to plough their field or provide piped water. This must be urgently and adequately monitored by UNTAG members or the elections will be unfairly influenced.

9. If the UNTAG force is reduced the Cuban withdrawal, already begun in good faith, will be seized by certain parties at any opportunity to bolster UNITA, hurt Angola and allow South Africa to retain its grip on Namibia.

10. The South West African Administrator General's proclamation of white elections on 1st March 1989 will further confuse the independence process.

Thus we are convinced that to reduce the size of the UNTAG force will seriously jeopardise the Namibian independence process and that the proposed elections will not be free and fair. The Namibian people will be left at the mercy of the South African forces and the whole of Southern Africa will remain unstable.

In addition, the delay occasioned by the Security Council debate is frustrating the planning and fundraising of well-intentioned people here. The repatriation programme is especially at risk. This delay in itself may weaken the effectiveness of the independence process in Namibia.

We therefore plead with the United Nations Security Council most desperately and urgently that the UNTAG be held at 7,500 and this force be constituted and established in Namibia without delay.

Signed:

The Rt. Rev. Hendrik Frederik (President, Council of Churches in Namibia, Bishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church).

JANUARY 21, 1989.

To: The Secretary General of the United Nations.
From: An emergency meeting of the Executive Committee of the Council of Churches in Namibia (CCN).

SIR: Having just received information from New York concerning the present impasse in the Security Council, which poses a threat to the implementation of Resolution 435, we have convened today in Windhoek and wish to make the following statement further to our telex of 16 January 1989:

1. We confirm the contents of our above mentioned telex and wish you to know that we are extremely worried over what we see as a critically urgent situation in the proposed reduction of the UNTAG military component from the original 7,500 to 4,500.

2. Considering that the resolution 435 is a child of the Security council and has stood for ten solid years, it is to our disappointment and beyond our understanding that the Security Council (and particularly the five permanent members), who knew all along what the costs would be, should now appear to renege on their own agreement. We appeal especially to those countries who have from the beginning been champions of the cause of Namibia in the Security Council to continue in their support and not to desert us in this last and crucial hour.

3. If this matter is merely concerned with finance, we beg that consideration be given to the terribly high price already paid by Namibians in their struggle for freedom, and to the inestimable cost that would be paid should one life be lost because there were not enough members of the UNTAG group to monitor and control the already known excesses of those disposed towards the South African system. A cheaply acquired settlement will ultimately prove astronomically costly to this region, and consequently to our trading partners. The ultimate choice is between South African colonialism and Namibian freedom.

4. We are deeply concerned at the size and unmonitored activities of the South West African Police (SWAPOL) forces which are known to be surrogates of the South African racist regime. The number of these forces should be known and specified and limited. The threatened reduction of the UNTAG military component from a minimum of 7,500 would allow the SWAPOL forces unbridled control over the election process.

5. We express our gratitude to the Secretary General, the member countries of the non-aligned nations, and the members of the African group for the position they have taken, for their understanding of our situation, and their sympathetic action on behalf of the Namibian people. In particular we express our admiration for General Prem Chand of India, for his witness for and support of the Namibian people's desire for a peaceful settlement with justice and dignity for all.

6. Please do not cut the costs on Namibia's future. Please do not reduce the UNTAG military component.

Signed:

SHARING UNITED JERUSALEM

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, through the years, I have visited Israel many times and have met every Prime Minister from David Ben-Gurion on.

But strangely, until my last visit to Israel, I had not met Mayor Teddy Kollek. He was always out of the country when I was there, or we were not able to get together.

Finally in my last visit, my friend Bob Asher arranged that my wife and I could get together with the Ashers and with Mayor Teddy Kollek for dinner one evening.

He is a refreshing, practical voice in Israel. And he reaches out to others in a marvelous way. The evening we were with him he had to leave somewhat early because he was going to some type of Greek Orthodox event.

Recently, Foreign Affairs magazine printed an article by him, "Sharing United Jerusalem."

You do not have to agree with every item in the article to recognize it contains a great deal of practical wisdom, which we have come to expect from Mayor Teddy Kollek.

I urge my colleagues in the House and the Senate to read his fine article.

At this point, I ask that this article be inserted in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SHARING UNITED JERUSALEM

(By Teddy Kollek)

The world's perception of the Arab-Israeli conflict and, indeed, much of its substance have been significantly altered by recent events in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Jerusalem. Eleven months of unrest and King Hussein's severing of the links between Jordan and the West Bank, have created a new and fluid situation. These events are focusing the world's attention on the need for new policies after twenty years of waiting in vain for Arab governments or Palestinian representatives to come to the peace table.

Thinking about new policies for Israel's relations with the Arab states and with the Palestinians should start with Jerusalem. On one hand, there is wide agreement that Jerusalem must be the last item on the agenda of any negotiations, because whatever is decided to be the fate of the West Bank will affect arrangements in Jerusalem. On the other hand, Jerusalem's importance is such that no negotiations can even begin as long as any one of the parties is persuaded that there is no possible reconciliation of the various interests concerning Jerusalem. After 21 years of administering Jerusalem as one city, we know that all communities, but in particular the Arab one, need a much larger measure of self-administration, autonomy or functional sovereignty. The municipality needs much more of the authority now vested in the government of Israel so that it can share this local authority with the communities and the neighborhoods. Our law on local governments is essentially the one we inherited from the British: introduced in Mandatory Palestine in the 1930s, it is based on the nineteenth-century municipal code of British India, designed to grant a minimum of authority to the "natives" and a maximum to the central government.

Changes are long overdue. They could and should be implemented independently of political developments elsewhere, and without waiting to see what will be the future of the West Bank and Gaza. The future of Jerusalem is to remain united and the capital of Israel, under the overall sovereignty of Israel. There is, however, room for functional division of authority, for internal autonomy of each community and for functional sovereignty. This would go a long way toward showing that a Jerusalem united and shared is not an obstacle to negotiations; on the contrary, it would be a significant contribution to the creation of a climate conducive to constructive bargaining.

II

Arab neighborhoods in East Jerusalem are no longer part of the West Bank. This situation has come about for several reasons, including the incorporation of East Jerusalem within Israel in 1967 and the 89,000 Jews living in new neighborhoods beyond the former armistice line. The main reason, however, is that the past twenty years have seen more change for the better for more people than did the previous two thousand years. These changes include some things that are commonplace in developed countries but less so in the Middle East: running water, sewers, public health services, low infant mortality, schooling for girls, voting rights for all adults, the right to join a trade union, religious freedom for all, a free press, excavation and preservation of archaeological sites and restoration and care of historic monuments. The world has recognized this in the last few years: even the automatic majority of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has toned down its routine condemnations of our efforts to preserve Jerusalem. These are but beginnings; much remains to be done.

Jerusalem's Arab community has made great progress. The most important and obvious indicator is its size: from an unchanging 70,000 between 1948 and 1967, it reached 132,000 in 1986 and is about 150,000 today, all but 15,000 of whom are Muslim. The corresponding Jewish population figures are: 100,000 in 1948, 200,000 in 1967, 336,000 in 1986 and about 350,000 today. Of course, a minority always feels it is the target of discrimination; the 90,000 ultra-Orthodox Jews in Jerusalem feel that way, too—as do the ultra-secular Jews. And Arabs naturally compare their conditions today with the prosperous new Jewish neighborhoods rather than with their own situation before 1967.

How different East Jerusalem is from the West Bank can be seen in the nature of the recent unrest, the intifadeh. One Arab youth killed, one policeman grievously injured, one young Jewish woman badly burned—these are the casualties recorded in Jerusalem during the months since December 1987 in which the intifadeh leadership has tried to import the uprising into Jerusalem. Only in the dozen villages that were incorporated into the Jerusalem municipality after 1967 did the movement receive a significant measure of support. In these villages a different kind of Arabic is spoken; education levels are lower; occupations are rural in character; the inhabitants are poorer; and Islamic fundamentalism is stronger; moreover, Jewish and Arab homes are often next to one another, without clear communal boundaries. It is the names of these villages that most often appear in the news when children and youths burn tires and throw rocks—A-Tur, Issawiya, Sur Baher, Shuafat, Beit Hanina, Silwan, Djebel Mukabber—although, at times, youths from these villages take their protest briefly into downtown East Jerusalem.

Another essential difference between Jerusalem and the West Bank is that the latter is administered by a special Israeli administration under the much harsher Jordanian civil law and under Israeli emergency regulations, inherited from the British; law and order is enforced there by the army under the supervision of military tribunals. All of Jerusalem is under the quite different Israeli law, administered by Israeli courts and enforced by the police. This means that the Arabs of Jerusalem are treated or have the right to be treated just like the Jews and all other citizens and residents of Israel.

Obviously, the same legislation and the same government and municipal regulations apply to Arabs and Jews alike; the judical system's lack of any discrimination is manifest and recognized by the Arabs. It is in government administration and law enforcement on the lower levels that equal treatment often lags behind the letter of the law. In any multi-ethnic city a minority always has to struggle for equal treatment from the city administration, even when there is no war and terrorism involved. In Jerusalem, the municipality is on the side of all minorities, and is handling cases of discrimination and harassment brought to its attention. It is not a question of equal rights but a question of good will and a question of time—and the Arabs and the other minorities know it, even if they sometimes suffer unjustly and impatiently.

III

A major and ever-present Arab concern, long antedating the intifadeh, is the suspicion that the basic intention of the Israeli government is to obliterate the Arab component in the city's character. While one can understand why the Arabs would feel this way, the facts are very different. We have been protecting the Arab aspect of Jerusalem and transferring attributes of functional sovereignty to the Arabs ever since reunification.

After the 1967 war, initiated by Jordan's full-scale attack against the Jewish quarters of Jerusalem, we gave the Arab inhabitants the choice between accepting Israeli citizenship (few opted for this choice) or retaining their Jordanian citizenship—which had been imposed on them by Jordan during its 19-year occupation of the eastern parts of the city.

This would be inconceivable anywhere else in the modern world. Whenever a city or a territory changes hands, the general rule is to bestow the new sovereign's citizenship upon the population, or to forcibly expel or, at best, exchange it. The inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine were subject to this treatment more than once, and this century knows many examples of such exchanges and explusions. The very first step is usually to force upon the inhabitants who remain an oath of allegiance to the new sovereign, as well as his citizenship, language and history books. We, instead, let those who so chose retain their Jordanian citizenship—and at the same time gave them the right to vote in Jerusalem municipal elections.

We in City Hall eventually succeeded in persuading our national government to introduce the Jordanian curriculum in the publicly funded city schools in the Arab neighborhoods. Thus, Arab graduates of our school system have access to universities all over the Arab world and qualify for Arab League scholarships. The Ministry of Education in Amman determined the curriculum, and we only removed blatant anti-Israeli and anti-Jewish bias from Jordanian and United Nations Relief and Works Agency textbooks.[1]

The Arab press is another enhancement of the Arab character of East Jerusalem and contribution to the autonomy of the Arab community. Since all of Jerusalem is part of Israel, Israeli law applies and both the Arab and the Jewish press are free, subject to military censorship. Though there are justified complaints that censorship is harsher on the Arab press, the fact is that there is no freer Arab press in the Middle East—and it must be remembered that no newspapers were published in East Jerusalem at the time of reunification in 1967. Today, four Arab dailies and a number of weeklies are published. It is true that from time to time an Arab paper runs into trouble; but on the other hand, a new addition to the Arab press, the weekly an-Nahar, became a daily quite recently.

The most important symbols and possessions of the Muslim Arab community of Jerusalem are the two mosques on the Temple Mount, the Dome of the Rock and al-Aqsa Mosque.[2] Immediately after the 1967 war Israel's military and political leaders assured Muslim and Christian dignitaries that all their rights would be respected as in the past.[3] These promises have been kept, even though difficulties occasionally have risen regarding the Temple Mount. Some nationalist Jewish groups in Israel, defying the government and the Supreme Court, claim the right to pray on the Temple Mount, stirring Muslim fears.[4] The Temple Mount's sanctity in Judaism may be one reason for the Muslims' suspicions and apprehension of Jewish encroachment and expropriation: as they cannot envision allowing "infidels," either Jews or Christians, to hold a Muslim holy place, they have no trust in Israel's accommodating attitude.

Jerusalem's Arabs will obviously continue to have strong links with the West Bank and with the rest of the Arab world. We see these links as an important factor for the maintenance of an autonomous Arab culture in Jerusalem. Each summer, over 100,000 Palestinans come freely to the West Bank and to Jerusalem from Arab countries which are at war with us, such as Jordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia. These are mostly first- second- and third-generation Palestinian emigres who return on family visits.

To sum up: the Arab presence in Jerusalem has been not harmed but strengthened since 1967. Evidence for this, together with the thriving Arab press and the restoration of Islamic historical monuments, includes the numerous educational and cultural institutions forming the Islamic University of Jerusalem; the Islamic college and library at al-Aqsa Mosque; the theological seminary in Beit Hanina; the school of social work in downtown East Jerusalem; the school of nursing in al-Bireh; and the college of science in Abu Dis.

IV

All this is as it should be in Jerusalem. The accent has traditionally been on the self-segregation of independent, organic and historical communities, each with its religion, language, literature, history, dress and food. This is why for centuries the Old City has been divided into four separate quarters: Christian, Armenian, Jewish and Muslim. For centuries these communities lived in greater or lesser harmony with each other.

The notion of "separate but equal" education was justly discredited in the United States because it was not equal and because the separation was imposed by the majority. The voluntary "separate and equal" tradition of the Old City spread out beyond the walls in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century. Today, among the Jewish population, we see clear signs of change: hailing from 103 diasporas, so vastly different, the Jews are gradually but steadily forming one cohesive, distinct national group. Even so, almost a third of the Jewish population lives in strictly separate ultra-Orthodox neighborhoods. Among the Arabs a similar process is taking place. People from the outlying Arab villages of Jerusalem show some signs of adjustment to the urban Arab society, but they are still known to each other as Jozi, "from Wadi Joz," or Turi, "from Abu Tor." They identify with their village communities and do not speak of themselves as Qudsi, "from the Holy City." Christians identify with one of the forty denominations present in Jerusalem, and one cannot speak of a single Christian community, only of the Greek, the Latin, the Armenian and other communities. Jerusalem is not a melting pot, nor does anyone see integration or uniformity as desirable or even theoretically possible, except within an individual community.

In this respect, a serious problem has developed in the Old City. In a test case, an Arab family which had owned a house in the Jewish Quarter prior to 1948 was denied the right either to rebuild it or acquire new housing in the reconstructed Jewish0 Quarter. The Supreme Court of Israel backed the government's decision, saying that homogeneous neighborhoods had always been a historical fact in Jerusalem, and that after all that had happened, the Jews were entitled to their exclusive quarter in the Old City.

Many of us assumed that this decision set the rules for the Muslim Quarter, too. However, in the past few years two Jewish religious schools, or yeshivot, moved into Muslim Quarter buildings owned by Jews since the end of the nineteenth century. These yeshivot sought to be as close as possible to the Temple Mount where, it is believed, the Messiah will appear at the End of Days.

Last December, one week after the outbreak of unrest in the West Bank and Gaza, Ariel Sharon, the minister of trade and industry and one of Israel's war heroes, moved into a Muslim Quarter building owned by Jews since 1884. His openly admitted purpose was to make a political statement to all and sundry that Jews had the right to live anywhere in Israel, including the Muslim Quarter. This move added to the tension in Jerusalem, was perceived by many Israelis as a provocative act, and clearly aroused Arab fears and suspicions that the Jews who come to live among them are trespassers intent on driving the Muslims out, one building at a time, from the Old City and from all of Jerusalem.

I believe that all of our diverse neighborhoods must be preserved accordng to the wishes of their present inhabitants. I oppose the yeshivot while understanding their motivations. I oppose and do not want to understand the provocation by Mr. Sharon.

Another major and related Arab concern is new housing for the expanding population. Jewish groups not larger than the Muslim community, the ultra-Orthodox haredim, have succeeded in having entire new neighborhoods built exclusively for them, with synagogues, ritual baths, traffic interdictions on the Sabbath and other religious requirements. The haredim are represented on the City Council and are able to form political alliances to further their interests.

[1] This will probably not change in the wake of King Hussein's severance of links with Palestinians west of the Jordan.

[2] Unlike the cities of Mecca and Medina, where no non-Muslim is allowed—even today—under penalty of death, not all of Jerusalem is sacred in Islam, only the mosques on the Temple Mount.

[3] Moshe Dayan, then minister of defense, had already started this process by ordering the removal of the Israeli flag from the minaret of the al-Aqsa Mosque one day after the fighting stopped in the Old City. He was also the moving spirit behind the immediate removal of the anti-sniper walls and the mine fields, and he convinced the government to allow unrestricted traffic throughout the city within a fortnight.

[4] Access, except during times of Muslim prayers, is of course free to all religions and nationalities, as it is to the Jewish and Christian holy places. Large numbers of tourists still visit the Temple Mount uninfluenced by the intifadeh, and the entrance fees for the two mosques contribute substantially to their upkeep. During the 19 years of Jordanian rule, no Jews of any nationality were allowed into the Old City; Muslims with Israeli citizenship were not allowed to visit the holy places, and Christians with Israeli citizenship were allowed to visit only Bethlehem and only on Christmas.

I deeply regret the fact that there are no Arabs on the City Council. Under Israeli law, citizens of other countries residing in Israel have the right to vote in municipal elections, and this of course applies also to all Jerusalem Arabs aged 18 and older, even when they are Jordanian citizens.[5] Arabs have made increasing use of their right to vote, in spite of threats appearing in the Arab media, but those who have wanted to stand for election have been subject to a greater danger. Last year Hanna Siniora, a Christian Arab journalist, announced his intention to run at the head of a party list, but although he is a sympathizer of the Palestine Liberation Organization, he was denounced by the Arab media, his family's two cars were burned and he received death threats until he reversed his decision.

This sorry situation means that either I or a colleague in my "One Jerusalem" coalition must represent the Arab population and look after its interests. My argument is that the Arabs are Jerusalemites and taxpayers. But we are a poor city with very limited resources, and each faction on the council tries to obtain a maximum of the resources for its constitutents. Arab councilors, vociferously stating their demands, would paradoxically help return the peace and we need and make it easier to obtain resources for the Arab sector, including new housing.

V

The basic dilemma that confronts us in the governance of Jerusalem is this: we are trying to run a democratic municipal administration in a city where most of the population, Jewish and Arab alike, lacks democratic traditions. Jews from Muslim countries from Afghanistan to Morocco, from Eastern Europe and Latin America have always distrusted the state apparatus; they survived by creating self-contained communities whose leaders represented them to the outside world and the state. The same is true of the forty Christian groups which have always lived under their religious hierarchies.

Nor could the Muslims of Jerusalem ever fully identify with their rulers: the Turks were Muslims, but under their administration the Muslim Arabs were only marginally better off than the Jews and the Christians. The British were "infidels"; and the Jordanians considered Palestinians second-class citizens, especially those in Jerusalem whom they correctly saw as opposed to the Hashemite regime. During Jordanian rule, migrants from the town of Hebron became a majority in Arab Jerusalem, changing the character of the city, and the native Christian communities declined to one-half of what they were in 1948, continuing a trend of emigration dating from the beginning of this century. Emigration of the affluent and the educated, caused by the lack of economic, professional and political opportunities, left Jerusalem's Arabs without a strong middle class.

None of these factors is favorable to the development of democratic habits. But even if all Jerusalemites actively participated in the democratic process, the city administration would still be unable to deal with many problems because, as mentioned above, the present Israeli law on municipalities leaves very little power to the city government.

To encourage citizens' involvement, neighborhood councils called minhalot were formed some eight years ago and exist today in a dozen Jewish and Arab neighborhoods. The present law prevents us from giving these councils much legal authority, so we established them as nonprofit associations in the hope that they would promote participatory democracy. Minhalot proved very effective as intermediaries between the individual or the family clan and the municipality. The quality of life in several Jewish and Arab neighborhoods was improved by the practical proposals of the minhalot for allocation of municipal resources or for modifying planning decisions.

Because they are not political entities, minhalot are not subject to objection on grounds of sovereignty or nationalism and can contribute to efficient planning and to peaceful resolution of conflicts. Minhalot were therefore acceptable to the Jordanian authorities before the severance of ties, and in some instances Jordanian as well as Israeli funding went to projects in Arab neighborhoods.

An expanded system of minhalot could eventually play a role in a permanent arrangement by becoming the framework for self-administration by the different autonomous communities within one municipality. Direct elections to the minhalot can assure that each neighborhood's religious, linguistic, ethnic, cultural, educational and economic character will be determined as in the past by its inhabitants and their customs and traditions—an important factor for peaceful coexistence.

Just how tragic the situation was in divided Jerusalem between 1948 and 1967 is mostly forgotten today, because the vast majority of Jerusalemites are too young to have seen the walls cutting through the city. Yet almost no one, Jew or Arab, would seriously advocate a physical redivision of Jerusalem. There can be no geographic division of sovereignty.

I believe that further sharing of functional authority and greater decentralization within Jerusalem is possible and very desirable. Retention of Jordanian citizenship, granting the municipal voting right to citizens of countries at war with us, the minhalot as frameworks for decentralization, the fully autonomous Muslim administration of the Temple Mount, the use of the Jordanian/Arab League curriculum in the city schools for Arab children—all these features prove that Israel's sovereignty is not diminished by Arab autonomy, and that Israel's sovereignty need not interfere with the Arab community's institutions and economic, cultural and even political life. Internal and external security and foreign policy are probably the only essential security within a municipal police force, and Israeli policy toward the Arab world could be influenced by its resident Arab community.

A significant advantage of this approach is that functional division of authority can be accomplished without formal and public negotiations, which in the present circumstances are practically impossible. However, once new measures are introduced they affect the daily life of everybody and become almost a customary right of the beneficiaries. What the Israeli government could do—and what I am urging it to do—is to institutionalize existing measures and generously expand their application so that eventually there will come to exist a body of rights to replace the present ad hoc arrangements. Then, if other governments were to expres their support for such rights, we could have some of the "international guarantees" so often mentioned for Jerusalem.

VI

The time is ripe for changes that would have been unthinkable a few years ago. According to one theory, Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat felt able to come to Jerusalem and eventually make peace only because of the elation Egypt experienced after its troops crossed the Suez Canal four years earlier. The subsequent crossing by Israel of the same canal and the threat to Cairo and to the Egyptian Third Army did not substantially affect this feeling of achievement.

The intifadeh may similarly affect the disposition of the Palestinians and enable them to enter negotiations with Israel. Even if the intifadeh loses intensity, its lasting effect could be a deep feeling of national satisfaction and pride. The intifadeh may also produce "homegrown" leaders more acceptable to Israel, in particular those who have rejected terrorism. If it ends otherwise, it will lose any positive effect it may have had.

At the same time, Israel's complacency of twenty years has been shaken and the necessity for changes is becoming clear to many Israelis. Once recognized, both sides' inability to attain all of their respective goals may convince them to enter negotiations. The arrangements tacitly implemented in Jerusalem could point the way to openly negotiated political compromises that will give neither side the feeling of success or failure, but will result in practical and livable (although not ideal) solutions.

At present no leaders can be said to represent the Jerusalem Arabs. The Supreme Muslim Council and other bodies were formed after 1967 to direct Muslim affairs in opposition to Israel, not in cooperation. Nevertheless, these bodies exist and enjoy a measure of authority. An ancient and influential institution is the Waqf, the religious foundation that administers Muslim holy places and owns large properties.[6] There are also members of centuries-old, venerable families who could regain the confidence of the Jerusalemite Muslim population: the Husseini, The Nashashibi, the Nusseibeh, the Khalidi, the Dajani and the Alami families; among the Hebronite community in Jerusalem are several established families which enjoy great respect, such as the Khattib and the Barakat families. The Christian Arabs have ecclesiastical hierarchies led by their respective patriarchs and bishops who have, to a high degree, kept their communities out of the conflict. Should the Arabs one day agree to discuss how they want to live in one undivided Jerusalem, they have leaders to negotiate the apportionment of authority to each community under Israel's overall sovereignty.

This is not utopia. For many generations there will remain some fear, resentment and

[5] In the 1983 elections, out of the 122,000 Muslim and Christian Arabs, there were approximately 58,000 adult men and women 18 years of age and above. Almost 15,000 voted and ten percent of them were women, an enormous change for the strongly traditional Arab society. They voted overwhelmingly for our "One Jerusalem" list, knowing that we will protect their interests as much as we can.

[6] As a part of King Hussein's severance of legal and administrative ties with the West Bank, all Jordanian civil servants and employees in the West Bank and Jerusalem were fired or forcibly retired by the Jordanian civil service, except those of the Waqf and of the Islamic tribunals, whose importance for the Muslims of Jerusalem and the West Bank was stressed as "embodying Islamic cultural presence" and "protecting both the holy Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqsa Mosque." The Waqf and the Islamic courts system, together with the minhalot in Arab neighborhoods, could provide the framework for communal autonomy.

religious fanaticism. Some Arabs will continue to deface Jewish tombs on the Mount of Olives as they do now from time to time, and as they did systematically after 1948 when Jewish gravestones were used for street-paving and latrines. Some Jews will insist on saying that there is no way of living with people who deface tombs and place refrigerators filled with explosive charges on busy downtown street corners. Such attitudes may last for a long time, but will eventually disappear—so we believe.

It is necessary to realize that this belief is not based on some sentimental, wishful thinking, but is a strongly felt conviction that pragmatically affects our day-to-day decisions. We recognize the existence of tension, hatred and violence, but we are guided by the decision to practice restraint, tolerance and understanding. We consider this a good investment, more than justified by the kind of Jerusalem we wish to see in the future.

Our vision has one major advantage favoring the building of this earthly new Jerusalem: it can be unilateral and still succeed, even if not everyone shares it. Its evolution depends on whether we are prepared to maintain our restraint in the face of cruel criticism, justified or unjustified, strictly avoid retaliation for violence, and ensure complete equality under the law. We must be realists and admit that violent incidents will occur and some among us may at times react violently. However, this should not mislead us into thinking that ours is an impossible task. The fundamental question is: Are we going to admit to ourselves that we have nothing to fear?

The flags that may fly from the mosques of the Temple Mount will not make Jerusalem less Jewish or more Muslim. Jerusalem is great enough for a few flags beside that of the State of Israel. We are here to stay, and deep in our hearts we know it, but it sometimes seems that we are uncomfortable asserting it. Fanatical minorities, such as Meir Kahane's movement or the Faithful of the Temple Mount, are born from a feeling of uncertainty, a remnant of the ghetto mentality, and from a lack of faith. Others have moments of uncertainty to which they react by making unnecessarily provocative statements.

We must be firm in declaring that the unity of Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, is beyond negotiation. But we must be sufficiently confident to announce that everything else is negotiable as a matter of course.

To sum up my modest proposal: we must make new and permanent arrangements in the city without waiting for negotiations on the national level, and we must do so independently of any such negotiations. Firmly embedded in the new status quo must be provisions for such important matters as the rights of the communities to internal self-administration in areas like education, welfare and sanitation; rights of communities to the geographical limits of their homogeneous neighborhoods as well as the authority to access their members for the cost of services, jurisdiction of each community's tribunals, the modalities of access to all holy places and the regulations of dress and behavior in them, jurisdiction over trespassers in the holy places, and any other matter of importance to each and every community. As defense and foreign policy will be reserved to the government of Israel, there should be no problem with sovereignty, real or symbolic, within one unified city.

We should expand the functional sovereignty and self-administration rights already transferred to the Arabs of Jerusalem. Those who think we should not are mistakenly afraid that we cannot afford it—but we decidedly can. The day we understand this we will be able to relieve legitimate Arab grievances without fear of showing weakness, and deal with violence without outraged surprise or feelings of failure.

It is clear that in the country's present mood, particularly after last month's elections, no government would be able to enshrine in law the rights of the non-Jewish minorities of Jerusalem, because a sufficient majority in the Knesset probably could not be mustered to pass such a measure. However, it may be feasible for the government to issue regulations empowering the municipality of Jerusalem to make such arrangements as are just and necessary. This would greatly calm Arab anxieties, especially if the government were to issue statements of intent and principle as to the main concerns of the Arabs, such as the Temple Mount, Jewish settlement in the Muslim Quarter of the Old City and new Arab housing outside the walls.

We of all people, who for two thousand years longed for Jerusalem, our historical and spiritual capital, must understand the feelings of the Arabs for Jerusalem, and realize that more time will have to pass until our vision of Jerusalem will be shared by the city's Arab residents. But we can make the waiting less difficult for all.●

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, pursuant to the requirements of paragraph 2 of Senate rule XXVI, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the rules of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the 101st Congress adopted by the committee on February 28, 1989.

The committee rules follow:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

(Adopted February 28, 1989)

RULE 1—JURISDICTION

(a) Substantive.—In accordance with Senate Rule XXV.1(j), the jurisdiction of the Committee shall extend to all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

1. Acquisition of land and buildings for embassies and legations in foreign countries.
2. Boundaries of United States.
3. Diplomatic service.
4. Foreign economic, military, technical, and humanitarian assistance.
5. Foreign loans.
6. International activities of the American National Red Cross and the International Committee of the Red Cross.
7. International aspects of nuclear energy, including nuclear transfer policy.
8. International conferences and congresses.
9. International law as it relates to foreign policy.
10. International Monetary Fund and other international organizations established primarily for international monetary purposes (except that, at the request of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, any proposed legislation relating to such subjects reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs).
11. Intervention abroad and declarations of war.
12. Measures to foster commercial intercourse with foreign nations and to safeguard American business interests abroad.
13. National security and international aspects of trusteeships of the United States.
14. Ocean and international environmental and scientific affairs as they relate to foreign policy.
15. Protection of United States citizens abroad and expatriation.
16. Relations of the United States with foreign nations generally.
17. Treaties and executive agreements, except reciprocal trade agreements.
18. United Nations and its affiliated organizations.
19. World Bank group, the regional development banks, and other international organizations established primarily for development assistance purposes.

The Committee is also mandated by Senate Rule XXV.1(j) to study and review, on a comprehensive basis, matters relating to the national security policy, foreign policy, and international economic policy as it relates to foreign policy of the United States, and matters relating to food, hunger, and nutrition in foreign countries, and report thereon from time to time.

(b) Oversight.—The Committee also has a responsibility under Senate Rule XXVI.8, which provides that ". . . each standing Committee . . . shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, and execution of those laws or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee."

(c) "Advice and Consent" Clauses.—The Committee has a special responsibility to assist the Senate in its constitutional function of providing "advice and consent" to all treaties entered into by the United States and all nominations to the principal executive branch positions in the field of foreign policy and diplomacy.

RULE 2—SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) Creation.—Unless otherwise authorized by law or Senate resolution, subcommittees shall be created by majority vote of the Committee and shall deal with such legislation and oversight of programs and policies as the Committee directs. Legislative measures or other matters may be referred to a subcommittee for consideration in the discretion of the Chairman or by vote of a majority of the Committee. If the principal subject matter of a measure or matter to be referred falls within the jurisdiction of more than one subcommittee, the Chairman or the Committee may refer the matter to two or more subcommittees for joint consideration.

(b) Assignments.—Assignments of members to subcommittees shall be made in an equitable fashion. No member of the Committee may receive assignment to a second subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members of the Committee have chosen assignments to one subcommittee, and no member shall receive assignments to a third subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members have chosen assignments to two subcommittees.

No member of the Committee may serve on more than three subcommittees at any one time.

The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Committee shall be ex officio members, without vote, of each subcommittee.

(c) Meetings.—Except when funds have been specifically made available by the Senate for a subcommittee purpose, no subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall hold hearings involving expenses without prior approval of the Chairman of the full Committee or by decision of the full Committee. Meetings of subcommittees shall be scheduled after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee with a view toward avoiding conflicts with meetings of other subcommittees insofar as possible. Meetings of subcommittees shall not be scheduled to conflict with meetings of the full Committee.

The proceedings of each subcommittee shall be governed by the rules of the full Committee, subject to such authorizations or limitations as the Committee may from time to time prescribe.

RULE 3—MEETINGS

(a) Regular Meeting Day.—The regular meeting day of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the transaction of Committee business shall be on Tuesday of each week, unless otherwise directed by the Chairman.

(b) Additional Meetings.—Additional meetings and hearings of the Committee may be called by the Chairman as he may deem necessary. If at least three members of the Committee desire that a special meeting of the Committee be called by the Chairman, those members may file in the offices of the Committee their written request to the Chairman for that special meeting. Immediately upon filing of the request, the Chief Clerk of the Committee shall notify the Chairman of the filing of the request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of the request, the Chairman does not call the requested special meeting, to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the members of the Committee may file in the offices of the Committee their written notice that a special meeting of the Committee will be held, specifying the date and hour of that special meeting. The Committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the Clerk shall notify all members of the Committee that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour.

(c) Minority Request.—Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee or a subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority on the Committee shall be entitled, upon request made by a majority of the minority members to the Chairman before the completion of such hearing, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to the measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(d) Public Announcement.—The Committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall make public announcement of the date, place, time and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week in advance of such hearings, unless the Chairman of the Committee, or subcommittee, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date.

(e) Procedure.—Insofar as possible, proceedings of the Committee will be conducted without resort to the formalities of parliamentary procedure and with due regard for the views of all members. Issues of procedure which may arise from time to time shall be resolved by decision of the Chairman, in consultation with the Ranking Minority Member. The Chairman, in consultation with the Ranking Minority Member, may also propose special procedures to govern the consideration of particular matters by the Committee.

(f) Closed Sessions.—Each meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, including meetings to conduct hearings, shall be open to the public, except that a meeting or series of meetings by the Committee or a subcommittee on the same subject for a period of no more than fourteen calendar days may be closed to the public on a motion made and seconded to go into closed session to discuss only whether the matters enumerated in paragraphs (1) through (6) would require the meeting to be closed followed immediately by a record vote in open session by a majority of the members of the Committee or subcommittee when it is determined that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such meeting or meetings—

(1) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States;

(2) will relate solely to matters of Committee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure;

(3) will tend to charge an individual with crime or misconduct; to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise to expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy, or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual;

(4) will disclose the identity of any informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement;

(5) will disclose information relating to the trade secrets or financial or commercial information pertaining specifically to a given person if—

(A) an Act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(B) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person, or

(6) may divulge matters required to be kept confidential under other provisions of law or Government regulations.

A closed meeting may be opened by a majority vote of the Committee.

(g) Staff Attendance.—A member of the Committee may have one member of his or her personal staff, for whom that member assumes personal responsibility, accompany and be seated nearby at Committee meetings.

Each member of the Committee may designate members of his or her personal staff, who hold a Top Secret security clearance, for the purpose of their eligibility to attend closed sessions of the Committee, subject to the same conditions set forth for Committee staff under Rules 12, 13, and 14.

In addition, the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader of the Senate, if they are not otherwise members of the Committee, may designate one member of their staff with a Top Secret security clearance to attend closed sessions of the Committee, subject to the same conditions set forth for Committee staff under Rules 12, 13 and 14. Staff of other Senators who are not members of the Committee may not attend closed sessions of the Committee.

Attendance of Committee staff at meetings shall be limited to those designated by the Staff Director or the Minority Staff Director.

The Committee, by majority vote, or the Chairman, with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority Member, may limit staff attendance at specific meetings.

RULE 4—QUORUMS

(a) Testimony.—For the purpose of taking sworn or unsworn testimony at any duly scheduled meeting a quorum of the Committee and each subcommittee thereof shall consist of one member.

(b) Business.—A quorum for the transaction of Committee or subcommittee business, other than for reporting a measure or recommendation to the Senate or the taking of testimony, shall consist of one-third of the members of the Committee or subcommittee, including at least one member from each party.

(c) Reporting.—A majority of the membership of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for reporting any measure or recommendation to the Senate. No measure or recommendation shall be ordered reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Committee members are physically present. The vote of the Committee to report a measure or matter shall require the concurrence of a majority of those members who are physically present at the time the vote is taken.

RULE 5—PROXIES

Proxies must be in writing with the signature of the absent member. Subject to the requirements of Rule 4 for the physical presence of a quorum to report a matter, proxy voting shall be allowed on all measures and matters before the Committee. However, proxies shall not be voted on a measure or matter except when the absent member has been informed of the matter on which he is being recorded and has affirmatively requested that he be so recorded.

RULE 6—WITNESSES

(a) General.—The Committee on Foreign Relations will consider requests to testify on any matter or measure pending before the Committee.

(b) Presentation.—If the Chairman so determines, the oral presentation of witnesses shall be limited to ten minutes. However, written statements of reasonable length may be submitted by witnesses and other interested persons who are unable to testify in person.

(c) Filing of Statements.—A witness appearing before the Committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall file a written statement of his proposed testimony at least 48 hours prior to his appearance, unless this requirement is waived by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member following their determination that there is good cause for failure to file such a statement.

(d) Expenses.—Only the Chairman may authorize expenditures of funds for the expenses of witnesses appearing before the Committee or its subcommittees.

(e) Requests.—Any witness called for a hearing may submit a written request to the Chairman no later than twenty-four hours in advance for his testimony to be in closed or open session, or for any other unusual procedure. The Chairman shall determine whether to grant any such request and shall notify the Committee members of the request and of his decision.

RULE 7—SUBPOENAS

(a) Authorization.—The Chairman or any other member of the Committee, when authorized by a majority vote of the Committee at a meeting or by proxies, shall have authority to subpoena the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records, or any other materials. When the Committee authorizes a subpoena, it may be issued upon the signature of the Chairman or any other member designated by the Committee.

(b) Return.—A subpoena, or a request to an agency, for documents may be issued whose return shall occur at a time and place other than that of a scheduled Committee meeting. A return on such a subpoena or request which is incomplete or accompanied by an objection constitutes good cause for a hearing on shortened notice. Upon such a return, the Chairman or any other member designated by him may convene a hearing by giving two others notice by telephone to all other members. One member shall constitute a quorum for such a hearing. The sole purpose of such hearing shall be to elucidate further information about the return and to rule on the objection.

(c) Depositions.—At the direction of the Committee, staff is authorized to take depositions from witnesses.

RULE 8—REPORTS

(a) Filing.—When the Committee has ordered a measure or recommendation reported, the report thereon shall be filed in the Senate at the earliest practicable time.

(b) Supplemental, Minority and Additional Views.—A member of the Committee who gives notice of his intentions to file supplemental, minority, or additional views at the time of final Committee approval of a measure or matter, shall be entitled to not less than 3 calendar days in which to file such views, in writing, with the Chief Clerk of the Committee. Such views shall then be included in the Committee report and printed in the same volume, as a part thereof, and their inclusion shall be noted on the cover of the report. In the absence of timely notice, the Committee report may be filed and printed immediately without such views.

(c) Rollcall Votes.—The results of all rollcall votes taken in any meeting of the Committee on any measure, or amendment thereto, shall be announced in the Committee report. The announcement shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor and votes cast in opposition to each such measure and amendment by each member of the committee.

RULE 9—TREATIES

(a) The Committee is the only committee of the Senate with jurisdiction to review and report to the Senate on treaties submitted by the President for Senate advice and consent. Because the House of Representatives has no role in the approval of treaties, the Committee is therefore the only congressional committee with responsibility for treaties.

(b) Once submitted by the President for advice and consent, each treaty is referred to the Committee and remains on its calendar from Congress to Congress until the Committee takes action to report it to the Senate or recommend its return to the President, or until the Committee is discharged of the treaty by the Senate.

(c) In accordance with Senate Rule XXX.2, treaties which have been reported to the Senate but not acted on before the end of Congress "shall be resumed at the commencement of the Next Congress as if no proceedings had previously been had thereon."

(d) Insofar as possible, the Committee should conduct a public hearing on each treaty as soon as possible after its submission by the President. Except in extraordinary circumstances, treaties reported to the Senate shall be accompanied by a written report.

RULE 10—NOMINATIONS

(a) Waiting Requirement.—Unless otherwise directed by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member, the Committee on Foreign Relations shall not consider any nomination until 6 calendar days after it has been formally submitted to the Senate.

(b) Public Consideration.—Nominees for any post who are invited to appear before the Committee shall be heard in public session, unless a majority of the Committee decrees otherwise.

(c) Required Data.—No nomination shall be reported to the Senate unless (1) the nominee has been accorded a security clearance on the basis of a thorough investigation by executive branch agencies; (2) in appropriate cases, the nominee has filed a confidential statement and financial disclosure report with the Committee; (3) the Committee has been assured that the nominee does not have any interests which could conflict with the interests of the government in the exercise of the nominee's proposed responsibilities; (4) for persons nominated to be chief of mission, ambassador-at-large, or minister, the Committee has received a complete list of any contributions made by the nominee or members of his immediate family to any Federal election campaign during the year of his or her nomination and for the four preceding years; and (5) for persons nominated to be chiefs of mission, a report on the demonstrated competence of that nominee to perform the duties of the position to which he or she has been nominated.

RULE 11—TRAVEL

(a) Foreign Travel.—No member of the Committee on Foreign Relations or its staff shall travel abroad on Committee business unless specifically authorized by the Chairman, who is required by law to approve vouchers and report expenditures of foreign currencies, and the Ranking Minority Member. Requests for authorization of such travel shall state the purpose and, when completed, a full substantive and financial report shall be filed with the Committee within 30 days. This report shall be furnished to all members of the Committee and shall not be otherwise disseminated without the express authorization of the Committee. Except in extraordinary circumstances, staff travel shall not be approved unless the reporting requirements have been fulfilled for all prior trips. Except for travel that is strictly personal, travel funded by non-U.S. Government sources is subject to the same approval and substantive reporting requirements as U.S. Government-funded travel. In addition, members and staff are reminded of Senate Rule XXXV.4 requiring a determination by the Senate Ethics Committee in the case of foreign-sponsored travel.

Any proposed travel by Committee staff for a subcommittee purpose must be approved by the subcommittee chairman and ranking minority member prior to submission of the request to the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the full Committee.

When the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member approve the foreign travel of a member of the staff of the committee not accompanying a member of the Committee, all members of the Committee shall be advised, prior to the commencement of such travel of its extent, nature, and purpose.

(b) Domestic Travel.—All official travel in the United States by the Committee staff shall be approved in advanced by the staff Director, or in the case of minority staff, by the Minority Staff Director.

(c) Personal Staff.—As a general rule, no more than one member of the personal staff of a member of the Committee may travel with that member with the approval of the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee. During such travel, the personal staff member shall be considered to be an employee of the Committee.

RULE 12—TRANSCRIPTS

(a) General.—The Committee on Foreign Relations shall keep verbatim transcripts of all Committee and subcommittee meetings and such transcripts shall remain in the custody of the Committee, unless a majority of the Committee decides otherwise. Transcripts of public hearings by the Committee shall be published unless the Chairman, with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority Member, determines otherwise.

(b) Classified or Restricted Transcripts.—

(1) The Chief Clerk of the Committee shall have responsibility for the maintenance and security of classified or restricted transcripts.

(2) A record shall be maintained of each use of classified or restricted transcripts.

(3) Classified or restricted transcripts shall be kept in locked combination safes in the Committee offices except when in active use by authorized persons for a period not to exceed two weeks. Extensions of this period may be granted as necessary by the Chief Clerk. They must never be left unattended and shall be returned to the Chief Clerk promptly when no longer needed.

(4) Except as provided in paragraph 7 below, transcripts classified secret or higher may not leave the Committee offices except for the purpose of declassification.

(5) Classified transcripts other than those classified secret or higher may leave the Committee offices in the possession of authorized persons with the approval of the Chairman. Delivery and return shall be made only by authorized persons. Such transcripts may not leave Washington, DC, unless adequate assurances for their security are made to the Chairman.

(6) Extreme care shall be exercised to avoid taking notes or quotes from classified transcripts. Their contents may not be divulged to any unauthorized person.

(7) Subject to any additional restrictions imposed by the Chairman with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority Member, only the following persons are authorized to have access to classified or restricted transcripts.

(i) Members and staff of the Committee in the Committee rooms;

(ii) Designated personal representatives of members of the Committee, and of the Majority and Minority Leaders, with appropriate security clearances, in the Committee's Capitol office;

(iii) Senators not members of the Committee, by permission of the Chairman in the Committee rooms;

(iv) Members of the executive departments involved in the meeting, in the Committee's Capitol office, or, with the permission of the Chairman, in the offices of the officials who took part in the meeting, but in either case, only for a specified and limited period of time, and only after reliable assurances against further reproduction or dissemination have been given.

(8) Any restrictions imposed upon access to a meeting of the Committee shall also apply to the transcript of such meeting, except by special permission of the Chairman and notice to the other members of the Committee. Each transcript of a closed session of the Committee shall include on its cover a description of the restrictions imposed upon access, as well as any applicable restrictions upon photocopying, note-taking or other dissemination.

(9) In addition to restrictions resulting from the inclusion of any classified information in the transcript of a Committee meeting, members and staff shall not discuss with anyone the proceedings of the Committee in closed session or reveal information conveyed or discussed in such a session unless that person would have been permitted to attend the session itself, or unless such communication is specifically authorized by the Chairman, the Ranking Minority Member, or in the case of staff, by the Staff Director or Minority Staff Director. A record shall be kept of all such authorizations.

(c) Declassification.—

(1) All restricted transcripts and classified Committee reports shall be declassified on a date twelve years after their origination unless the Committee by majority vote decides against such declassification, and provided that the executive departments involved and all former Committee members who participated directly in the sessions or reports concerned have been consulted in advance and given a reasonable opportunity to raise objections to such declassification.

(2) Any transcript or classified Committee report, or any portion thereof, may be declassified fewer than twelve years after their organization if:

(i) the Chairman originates such action or receives a written request for such action, and notifies the other members of the Committee; and

(ii) the Chairman, Ranking Minority Member, and each member or former member who participated directly in such meeting or report give their approval, except that the Committee by majority vote may overrule any objections thereby raised to early declassification; and

(iii) the executive departments and all former Committee members are consulted in advance and have a reasonable opportunity to object to early declassification.

RULE 13-CLASSIFIED MATERIAL

(a) All classified material received or originated by the Committee shall be logged in at the Committee's offices in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, and except for material classified as "Top Secret" shall be filed in the Dirksen Senate Building offices for Committee use and safekeeping.

(b) Each such piece of classified material received or originated shall be card indexed and serially numbered, and where requiring onward distribution shall be distributed by means of an attached indexed form approved by the Chairman. If such material is to be distributed outside the Committee offices, it shall, in addition to the attached form, be accompanied also by an approved signature sheet to show onward receipt.

(c) Distribution of classified material among offices shall be by Committee members or authorized staff only. All classified material sent to members' offices, and that distributed within the working offices of the Committee, shall be returned to the offices designated by the Chief Clerk. No classified material is to be removed from the offices of the members or of the Committee without permission of the Chairman. Such classified material will be afforded safe handling and safe storage at all times.

(d) Material classified "Top Secret," after being indexed and numbered shall be sent to the Committee's Capitol office for use by the members and authorized staff in that office only or in such other secure committee offices as may be authorized by the Chairman or Staff Director.

(e) In general, members and staff undertake to confine their access to classified information on the basis of a "need to know" such information related to their Committee responsibilities.

(f) The Staff Director is authorized to make such administrative regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of these regulations.

RULE 14—STAFF

(a) Responsibilities.—

(1) The staff works for the Committee as a whole, under the general supervision of the Chairman of the Committee, and the immediate direction of the Staff Director; provided, however, that such part of the staff as is designated Minority Staff, shall be under the general supervision of the Ranking Minority Member and under the immediate direction of the Minority Staff Director.

(2) Any member of the Committee should feel free to call upon the staff at any time for assistance in connection with the Committee business. Members of the Senate not members of the Committee who call upon the staff for assistance from time to time should be given assistance subject to the overriding responsibility of the staff to the Committee.

(3) The staff's primary responsibility is with respect to bills, resolutions, treaties, and nominations.

In addition to carrying out assignments from the Committee and its individual members, the staff has a responsibility to originate suggestions for Committee or subcommittee consideration. The staff also has a responsibility to make suggestions to individual members regarding matters of special interest to such members.

(4) It is part of the staff's duty to keep itself as well informed as possible in regard to developments affecting foreign relations and in regard to the administration of foreign programs of the United States. Significant trends or developments which might otherwise escape notice should be called to the attention of the Committee, or of individual Senators with particular interests.

(5) The staff shall pay due regard to the constitutional separation of powers between the Senate and the executive branch. It therefore has a responsibility to help the Committee bring to bear an independent, objective judgment of proposals by the executive branch and when appropriate to originate sound proposals of its own. At the same time, the staff shall avoid impinging upon the day-to-day conduct of foreign affairs.

(6) In those instances when Committee action requires the expression of minority views, the staff shall assist the minority as fully as the majority to the end that all points of view may be fully considered by members of the Committee and of the Senate. The staff shall bear in mind that under our constitutional system it is the responsibility of the elected Members of the Senate to determine legislative issues in the light of as full and fair a presentation of the facts as the staff may be able to obtain.

(b) Restrictions.—

(1) The staff shall regard its relationship to the Committee as a privileged one, in the nature of the relationship of a lawyer to a client. In order to protect this relationship and the mutual confidence which must prevail if the Committee-staff relationship is to be a satisfactory and fruitful one, the following criteria shall apply:

(i) Members of the staff shall not be identified with any special interest group in the field of foreign relations or allow their names to be used by such group;

(ii) Members of the staff shall not accept public speaking engagements or write for publication in the field of foreign relations without specific advance permission from the Staff Director, or, in the case of minority staff, from the Minority Staff Director. In the case of the Staff Director and the Minority Staff Director, such advance permission shall be obtained from the Chairman or the Ranking Minority Member, as appropriate. In any event, such public statements should avoid the expression of personal views and should not contain predictions of future, or interpretations of past, Committee action.

(iii) Staff shall not discuss their private conversations with members of the Committee without specific advance permission from the Senator or Senators concerned.

(2) The staff shall not discuss with anyone the proceedings of the Committee in closed session or reveal information conveyed or discussed in such a session unless that person would have been permitted to attend the session itself, or unless such communication is specifically authorized by the Staff Director or Minority Staff Director. Unauthorized disclosure of information from a closed session or of classified information shall be cause for immediate dismissal and may, in the case of some kinds of information, be grounds for criminal prosecution.

RULE 15—STATUS AND AMENDMENT OF RULES

(a) Status.—In addition to the foregoing, the Committee on Foreign Relations is governed by the Standing Rules of the Senate which shall take precedence in the event of a clear inconsistency. In addition, the jurisdiction and responsibilities of the Committee with respect to certain matters, as well as the timing and procedure for their consideration in Committee, may be governed by statute.

(b) Amendment.—These Rules may be modified, amended, or repealed by a majority of the Committee, provided that a notice in writing of the proposed change has been given to each member at least 48 hours prior to the meeting at which action thereon is to be taken. However, rules of the Committee which are based upon Senate rules may not be superseded by Committee vote alone.●

RULES OF PROCEDURE FOR THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FOR THE 101ST CONGRESS

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, in accordance with rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I ask that the Rules of Procedure of the Committee on Armed Services for the 101st Congress, which were adopted by the committee on February 23, 1989, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Rules of Procedure follow:

ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE RULES OF PROCEDURE

(Adopted February 23, 1989)

1. Regular Meeting Day and Time. The regular meeting day of the committee shall be each Thursday at 10:00 a.m., unless the committee or the chairman directs otherwise.

2. Additional Meetings. The chairman may call such additional meetings as he deems necessary.

3. Special Meetings. Special meetings of the committee may be called by a majority of the members of the committee in accordance with paragraph 3 of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

4. Opening Meetings. Each meeting of the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, including meetings to conduct hearings, shall be open to the public, except that a meeting or series of meetings by the committee or a subcommittee thereof on the same subject for a period of no more than fourteen (14) calendar days may be closed to the public on a motion made and seconded to go into closed session to discuss only whether the matters enumerated below in clauses (a) through (f) would require the meeting to be closed, followed immediately by a recorded vote in open session by a majority of the members of the committee or subcommittee when it is determined that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such meeting or meetings—

(a) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States;

(b) will relate solely to matters of committee staff personnel or internal staff management of procedure;

(c) will tend to charge an individual with a crime or misconduct, to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise to expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual;

(d) will disclose the identity of any informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement;

(e) will disclose information relating to the trade secrets or financial or commercial information pertaining specifically to a given person if—

(1) an Act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(2) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person; or

(f) may divulge matters required to be kept confidential under other provisions of law or Government regulations.

5. Presiding Officer. The chairman shall preside at all meetings and hearings of the committee except that in his absence the ranking majority member present at the meeting or hearing shall preside unless by majority vote the committee provides otherwise.

6. Quorum. (a) A majority of the members of the committee are required to be actually present to report a matter or measure from the Committee.

(b) Except as provided in subsections (a) and (c), and other than for the conduct of hearings, seven members of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of such business as may be considered by the committee.

(c) Three members of the committee, one of whom shall be a member of the minority party, shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the full committee.

(d) Proxy votes may not be considered for the purpose of establishing a quorum.

7. Proxy voting. Proxy voting shall be allowed on all measures and matters before the committee. The vote by proxy of any member of the committee may be counted for the purpose of reporting any measure or matter to the Senate if the absent member casting such vote has been informed of the matter on which he is being recorded and has affirmatively requested that he be so recorded.

8. Announcement of Votes. The results of all rollcall votes taken in any meeting of the committee on any measure, or amendment thereto, shall be announced in the committee report, unless previously announced by the committee. The announcement shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor and votes cast in opposition to each such measure and amendment by each member of the committee who was present at such meeting. The Chairman may hold open a rollcall vote on any measure or matter which is before the committee until no later than midnight of the day on which the committee votes on such measure or matter.

9. Subpoenas. Subpoenas for attendance of witnesses and for the production of memoranda, documents, records, and the like may be issued by the chairman or any other member designated by him, but only when authorized by a majority of the members of the committee. The subpoena shall briefly state the matter to which the witness is expected to testify or the documents to be produced.

10. Hearings. (a) Public notice shall be given of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be held by the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, at least 1 week in advance of such hearing, unless the committee or subcommittee determines that good cause exists for beginning such hearings at an earlier time.

(b) Hearings may be initiated only by the specified authorization of the committee or subcommittee.

(c) Hearings shall be held only in the District of Columbia unless specifically authorized to be held elsewhere by a majority vote of the committee or subcommittee conducting such hearings.

(d) Witnesses appearing before the committee shall file with the clerk of the committee a written statement of his proposed testimony at least 24 hours not including weekends or holidays prior to a hearing at which he is to appear unless the chairman and the ranking minority member determines that there is good cause for the failure of the witness to file such a statement.

(e) Confidential testimony taken or confidential material presented in a closed hearing of the committee or subcommittee or any report of the proceedings of such hearing shall not be made public in whole or in part or by way of summary unless authorized by a majority vote of the committee or subcommittee.

(f) Any witness summoned to give testimony or evidence at a public or closed hearing of the committee or subcommittee may be accompanied by counsel of his own choosing who shall be permitted at all times during such hearing to advise such witness of his legal rights.

(g) Witnesses providing unsworn testimony to the committee may be given a transcript of such testimony for the purpose of making minor grammatical corrections. Such witnesses will not, however, be permitted to alter the substance of their testimony. Any question involving such corrections shall be decided by the chairman.

11. Nominations. Unless otherwise ordered by the committee, nominations referred to the committee shall be held for at least seven (7) days before being voted on by the committee. Each member of the committee shall be furnished a copy of all nominations referred to the committee.

12. Real Property Transactions. Each member of the committee shall be furnished with a copy of the proposals of the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, submitted pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2662 and with a copy of the proposals of the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, submitted pursuant to 50 U.S.C. App. 2285, regarding the proposed acquisition or disposition of property of an estimated price or rental of more than $50,000. Any member of the committee objecting to or requesting information on a proposed acquisition or disposal shall communicate his objection or request to the chairman of the committee within thirty (30) days from the date of submission.

13. Legislative Calendar. (a) The clerk of the committee shall keep a printed calendar for the information of each committee member showing the bills introduced and referred to the committee and the status of such bills. Such calendar shall be revised from time to time to show pertinent changes in such bills, the current status thereof, and new bills introduced and referred to the committee. A copy of each new revision shall be furnished to each member of the committee.

(b) Unless otherwise ordered, measures referred to the committee shall be referred by the clerk of the committee to the appropriate department or agency of the Government for reports thereon.

14. Except as otherwise specified herein, the Standing Rules of the Senate shall govern the actions of the committee. Each subcommittee of the committee is part of the committee, and is therefore subject to the committee's rules so far as applicable.

15. Powers and Duties of Subcommittees. Each subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the full committee on all matters referred to it. Subcommittee chairmen shall set dates for hearings and meetings of their respective subcommittees after consultation with the chairman and other subcommittee chairmen with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of full committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings whenever possible.●

RULES AND SUBCOMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I submit for printing in the RECORD, the rules of the Committee on Small Business as required by rule XXVI, paragraph 2, of the Standing Rules of the Senate. I would also like to submit a listing of the committee's subcommittee assignments.

I ask that this material be printed in its entirety.

The material follows:

COMMITTEE RULES

1. GENERAL

All applicable provisions of the Standing Rules of the Senate and of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, shall govern the Committee and its Subcommittees. The Rules of the Committee shall be the Rules of any Subcommittee of the Committee.

2. MEETINGS AND QUORUMS

(a) The regular meeting day of the Committee shall be the first Wednesday of each month unless otherwise directed by the Chairman. All other meetings may be called by the Chairman as he deems necessary, on three days notice where practicable. If at least three Members of the Committee desire the Chairman to call a special meeting, they may file in the office of the Committee a written request therefor, addressed to the Chairman. Immediately thereafter, the Clerk of the Committee shall notify the Chairman of such request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of such request, the Chairman fails to call the requested special meeting, which is to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of such request, a majority of the Committee Members may file in the Office of the Committee their written notice that a special Committee meeting will be held, specifying the date, hour and place thereof, and the Committee shall meet at that time and place. Immediately upon the filing of such notice, the Clerk of the Committee shall notify all Committee Members that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date, hour and place. If the Chairman is not present at any regular, additional or special meeting, the ranking majority Member present shall preside.

(b)(1) Ten Members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for reporting any legislative measure or nomination.

(2) Six Members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of routine business, provided that the minority Member is present. The term "routine business" includes, but is not limited to, the consideration of legislation pending before the Committee and any amendments thereto, and voting on such amendments. 132 Cong. Rec. S3231 (daily ed. March 21, 1986).

(3) In hearings, whether in public or closed session, a quorum for the taking of testimony, including sworn testimony, shall consist of one Member of the Committee or subcommittee.

(c) Proxies will be permitted in voting upon the business of the Committee by Members who are unable to be present. To be valid, proxies must be signed and assign the right to vote to one of the Members who will be present. Proxies shall in no case be counted for establishing a quorum.

3. HEARINGS

(a)(1) The Chairman of the Committee may initiate a hearing of the Committee on his authority or upon his approval of a request by any Member of the Committee. The Chairman of any subcommittee may, after approval of the Chairman, initiate a hearing of the subcommittee on his authority or at the request of any member of the subcommittee. Written notice of all hearings shall be given, as far in advance as practicable, to Member of the Committee.

(2) Hearings of the Committee or any subcommittee shall not be scheduled outside the District of Columbia unless specifically authorized by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member or by consent of a majority of the Committee. Such consent may be given informally, without a meeting.

(b)(1) Any Member of the Committee shall be empowered to administer the oath to any witness testifying as to fact if a quorum be present as specified in Rule 2(b).

(2) Any Member of the Committee may attend any meeting or hearing held by any subcommittee and question witnesses testifying before any subcommittee.

(3) Interrogation of witnesses at hearings shall be conducted on behalf of the Committee by Members of the Committee or such Committee staff as is authorized by the Chairman or Ranking Minority Member.

(4) Witnesses appearing before the Committee shall file with the Clerk of the Committee a written statement of the prepared testimony at least 24 hours in advance of the hearing at which the witness is to appear unless this requirement is waived by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member.

(c) Witnesses may be subpoenaed by the Chairman with the agreement of the Ranking Minority Member or by consent of a majority of the Members of the Committee. Such consent may be given informally, without a meeting. Subpoenas shall be issued by the Chairman or by any Member of the Committee designated by him. Subcommittees shall not have the right to authorize or issue subpoenas. As subpoena for the attendance of a witness shall state briefly the purpose of the hearing and the matter or matters to which the witness is expected to testify. A subpoena for the production of memoranda, documents and records shall identify the papers required to be produced with as much particularity as is practicable.

(d) Any witness summoned to a public or closed hearing may be accompanied by counsel of his own choosing, who shall be permitted while the witness is testifying to advise him of his legal rights.

(e) No confidential testimony taken, or confidential material presented to the Committee, or any report of the proceedings of a closed hearing, or confidential testimony or material submitted voluntarily or pursuant to a subpoena, shall be made public, either in whole or in part or by way of summary, unless authorized by a majority of the Members of the Committee.

4. AMENDMENT OF RULES

The foregoing rules may be added to, modified or amended: provided, however, that not less than a majority of the entire Membership so determine at a regular meeting with due notice, or at a meeting specifically called for that purpose.●

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE RULES OF PROCEDURE

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, paragraph 2 of Senate rule XXVI requires that, not later than March 1 of each year, the rules of each committee be published in the RECORD, and that not more than 30 days after a committee amends its rules, the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

In compliance with both of these provisions, I ask that the rules of the Committee on Finance as amended on February 23, 1989, by unanimous vote of the committee, be printed in the RECORD at this point, along with a copy of the amendment.

The material follows:

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

RULES OF PROCEDURE

(Adopted February 23, 1989)

Rule 1. Regular Meeting Days.—The regular meeting day of the committee shall be the second and fourth Tuesday of each month, except that if there be no business before the committee the regular meeting shall be omitted.

Rule 2. Committee Meetings.—(a) Except as provided by paragraph 3 of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to special meetings called by a majority of the committee) and subsection (b) of this rule, committee meetings, for the conduct of business, for the purpose of holding hearings, or for any other purpose, shall be called by the chairman. Members will be notified of committee meetings at least 48 hours in advance, unless the chairman determines that an emergency situation requires a meeting on shorter notice. The notification will include a written agenda together with materials prepared by the staff relating to that agenda. After the agenda for a committee meeting is published and distributed, no nongermane items may be brought up during that meeting unless at least two-thirds of the members present agree to consider those items.

(b) In the absence of the chairman, meetings of the committee may be called by the ranking majority member of the committee who is present, provided authority to call meetings has been delegated to such member by the chairman.

Rule 3. Presiding Officer.—(a) The chairman shall preside at all meetings and hearings of the committee except that in his absence the ranking majority member who is present at the meeting shall preside.

(b) Notwithstanding the rule prescribed by subsection (a) any member of the committee may preside over the conduct of a hearing.

Rule 4. Quorums.—(a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) seven members, including not less than one member of the majority party and one member of the minority party, shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of business.

(b) Notwithstanding the rule prescribed by subsection (a), one member shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of conducting a hearing.

(c) Once a quorum as prescribed by subsection (a) has been established for the conduct of business in executive session, the committee may continue to conduct business so long as five or more members are present, including not less than one member of the majority party and one member of the minority party.

Rule 5. Reporting of Measures or Recommendations.—No measure or recommendation shall be reported from the committee unless a majority of the committee is actually present and a majority of those present concur.

Rule 6. Proxy Voting; Polling.—(a) Except as provided by paragraph 7(a)(3) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to limitation on use of proxy voting to report a measure or matter), members who are unable to be present may have their vote recorded by proxy.

(b) At the discretion of the committee, members who are unable to be present and whose vote has not been cast by proxy may be polled for the purpose of recording their vote on any rollcall taken by the committee.

Rule 7. Order of Motions.—When several motions are before the committee dealing with related or overlapping matters, the chairman may specify the order in which the motions shall be voted upon.

Rule 8. Bringing a Matter to a Vote.—If the chairman determines that a motion or amendment has been adequately debated, he may call for a vote on such motion or amendment, and the vote shall then be taken, unless the committee votes to continue debate on such motion or amendment, as the case may be. The vote on a motion to continue debate on any motion or amendment shall be taken without debate.

Rule 9. Public Announcement of Committee Votes.—Pursuant to paragraph 7(b) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to public announcement of votes), the results of rollcall votes taken by the committee on any measure (or amendment thereto) or matter shall be announced publicly not later than the day on which such measure or matter is ordered reported from the committee.

Rule 10. Subpoenas.—Subpoenas for attendance of witnesses and the production of memoranda, documents, and records shall be issued by the chairman, or by any other member of the committee designated by him.

Rule 11. Open Committee Hearings.—To the extent required by paragraph 5 of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to limitations on open hearings), each hearing conducted by the committee shall be open to the public.

Rule 12. Announcement of Hearings.—The committee shall undertake consistent with the provisions of paragraph 4(a) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to public notice of committee hearings) to issue public announcements of hearings it intends to hold at least one week prior to the commencement of such hearings.

Rule 13. Witnesses at Hearings.—(a) Each witness who is scheduled to testify at any hearing must submit his written testimony to the staff director not later than noon of the business day immediately before the last business day preceding the day on which he is scheduled to appear. Such written testimony shall be accompanied by a brief summary of the principal points covered in the written testimony. Having submitted his written testimony, the witness shall be allowed not more than ten minutes for oral presentation of his statement.

(b) Witnesses may not read their entire written testimony, but must confine their oral presentation to a summarization of their arguments.

(c) Witnesses shall observe proper standards of dignity, decorum and propriety while presenting their views to the committee. Any witness who violates this rule shall be dismissed, and his testimony (both oral and written) shall not appear in the record of the hearing.

(d) In scheduling witnesses for hearings, the staff shall attempt to schedule witnesses so as to attain a balance of views early in the hearings. Every member of the committee may designate witnesses who will appear before the committee to testify. To the extent that a witness designated by a member cannot be scheduled to testify during the time set aside for the hearing, a special time will be set aside for that witness to testify if the member designating that witness is available at that time to chair the hearing.

Rule 14. Audiences.—Persons admitted into the audience for open hearings of the committee shall conduct themselves with the dignity, decorum, courtesy and propriety traditionally observed by the Senate. Demonstrations of approval or disapproval of any statement or act by any member or witness are not allowed. Persons creating confusion or distraction or otherwise disrupting the orderly proceeding of the hearing shall be expelled from the hearing.

Rule 15. Broadcasting of Hearings.—(a) Broadcasting of open hearings by television or radio coverage shall be allowed upon approval by the chairman of a request filed with the staff director not later than noon of the day before the day on which such coverage is desired.

(b) If such approval is granted, broadcasting coverage of the hearing shall be conducted unobtrusively and in accordance with the standards of dignity, propriety, courtesty and decorum traditionally observed by the Senate.

(c) Equipment necessary for coverage by television and radio media shall not be installed in, or removed from, the hearing room while the committee is in session.

(d) Additional lighting may be installed in the hearing room by the media in order to raise the ambient lighting level to the lowest level necessary to provide adequate television coverage of the hearing at the then current state of the art of television coverage.

(e) The additional lighting authorized by subsection (d) of this rule shall not be directed into the eyes of any members of the committee or of any witness, and at the request of any such member or witness, offending lighting shall be extinguished.

(f) No witness shall be required to be photographed at any hearing or to give testimony while the broadcasting (or coverage) of that hearing is being conducted. At the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio or television coverage, all equipment used for coverage shall be turned off.

Rule 16. Subcommittees.—(a) The chairman, subject to the approval of the committee, shall appoint legislative subcommittees. All legislation shall be kept on the full committee calendar unless a majority of the members present and voting agree to refer specific legislation to an appropriate subcommittee.

(b) The chairman may limit the period during which House-passed legislation referred to a subcommittee under paragraph (a) will remain in that subcommittee. At the end of that period, the legislation will be restored to the full committee calendar. The period referred to in the preceding sentences should be 6 weeks, but may be extended in the event that adjournment or a long recess is imminent.

(c) All decisions of the chairman are subject to approval or modification by a majority vote of the committee.

(d) The full committee may at any time by majority vote of those members present discharge a subcommittee from further consideration of a specific piece of legislation.

(e) Because the Senate is constitutionally prohibited from passing revenue legislation originating in the Senate, subcommittees may mark up legislation originating in the Senate and referred to them under Rule 16(a) to develop specific proposals for full committee consideration but may not report such legislation to the full committee. The preceding sentence does not apply to nonrevenue legislation originating in the Senate.

(f) The chairman and ranking minority members shall serve as nonvoting ex officio members of the subcommittees on which they do not serve as voting members.

(g) Any member of the committee may attend hearings held by any subcommittee and question witnesses testifying before that subcommittee.

(h) Subcommittee meeting times shall be coordinated by the staff director to insure that—

(1) no subcommittee meeting will be held when the committee is in executive session, except by unanimous consent;

(2) no more than one subcommittee will meet when the full committee is holding hearings; and.

(3) not more than two subcommittees will meet at the same time.

Notwithstanding paragraphs (2) and (3), a subcommittee may meet when the full committee is holding hearings and two subcommittees may meet at the same time only upon the approval of the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee and subcommittees involved.

(i) All nominations shall be considered by the full committee.

(j) The chairman will attempt to schedule reasonably frequent meetings of the full committee to permit consideration of legislation reported favorably to the committee by the subcommittees.

Rule 17. Transcripts of Committee Meetings.—An accurate record shall be kept of all markups of the committee, whether they be open or closed to the public. This record, marked as "uncorrected," shall be available for inspection by Members of the Senate, or members of the committee together with their staffs, at any time. This record shall not be published or made public in any way except:

(a) By majority vote of the committee after all members of the committee have had a reasonable opportunity to correct their remarks for grammatical errors or to accurately reflect statements made.

(b) Any member may release his own remarks made in any markup of the committee provided that every member or witness whose remarks are contained in the released portion is given a reasonable opportunity before release to correct their remarks.

Notwithstanding the above, in the case of the record of an executive session of the committee that is closed to the public pursuant to Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the record shall not be published or made public in any way except by majority vote of the committee after all members of the committee have had a reasonable opportunity to correct their remarks for grammatical errors or to accurately reflect statements made.

Rule 18. Amendment of Rules.—The foregoing rules may be added to, modified, amended or suspended at any time.●

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I herewith submit a copy of rules of procedure adopted by the Committee on Governmental Affairs pursuant to rule

XXVI, section 2, Standing Rules of the Senate, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The rules follow:

RULES OF PROCEDURE OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

(Pursuant to Rule XXVI, Sec. 2, Standing Rules of the Senate)

RULE 1. MEETINGS AND MEETING PROCEDURES OTHER THAN HEARINGS.

A. Meeting dates. The Committee shall hold its regular meetings on the first Thursday of each month, when the Congress is in session, or at such other times as the chairman shall determine. Additional meetings may be called by the chairman as he deems necessary to expedite Committee business. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 3, Standing Rules of the Senate.)

B. Calling special Committee meetings. If at least three members of the Committee desire the chairman to call a special meeting, they may file in the offices of the Committee a written request therefore, addressed to the chairman. Immediately thereafter, the clerk of the Committee shall notify the chairman of such request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of such request, the chairman fails to call the requested special meeting, which is to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of such request, a majority of the Committee members may file in the offices of the Committee their written notice that a special Committee meeting will be held, specifying the date and hour thereof, and the Committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of such notice, the Committee clerk shall notify all Committee members that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour. If the chairman is not present at any regular, additional or special meeting, the ranking majority member present shall preside. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 3, Standing Rules of the Senate.)

C. Meeting notices and agenda. Written notices of Committee meetings, accompanied by an agenda, enumerating the items of business to be considered, shall be sent to all Committee members, at least three days in advance of such meetings. In the event that unforseen requirements or Committee business prevent a three-day notice, the Committee staff shall communicate such notice by telephone or otherwise to members or appropriate staff assistants in their offices, and an agenda will be furnished prior to the meeting.

D. Open business meetings. Meetings for the transaction of Committee or Subcommittee business shall be conducted in open session, except that a meeting or series of meetings on the same subject for a period of no more than fourteen calendar days may be closed to the public on a motion made and seconded to go into closed session to discuss only whether the matters enumerated in clauses (1) through (6) below would require the meeting to be closed, followed immediately by a record vote in open session by a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee members when it is determined that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such meeting or meetings—

(1) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of foreign relations of the United States;

(2) will relate solely to matters of Committee or Subcommittee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure;

(3) will tend to charge an individual with crime or misconduct, to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual;

(4) will disclose the identity of an informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement;

(5) will disclose information relating to the trade secrets of financial or commercial information pertaining specifically to a given person if—

(A) an Act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(B) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government or financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person; or

(6) may divulge matters required to be kept confidential under other provisions of law or Government regulations. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 5(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

Notwithstanding the foregoing, whenever disorder arises during a Committee meeting that is open to the public, or any demonstration of approval or disapproval is indulged in by any person in attendance at any such meeting, it shall be the duty of the chairman to enforce order on his own initiative and without any point of order being made by a member of the Committee; Provided, further, that when the chairman finds it necessary to maintain order, he shall have the power to clear the room, and the Committee may act in closed session for so long as there is doubt of the assurance of order. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 5(d), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

E. Prior notice of first degree amendments. It shall not be in order for the Committee, or a Subcommittee thereof, to consider any amendment in the first degree proposed to any measure under consideration by the Committee or Subcommittee unless a written copy of such amendment has been delivered to each member of the Committee or Subcommittee, as the case may be, and to the office of the Committee or Subcommittee, at least 24 hours before the meeting of the Committee or Subcommittee at which the amendment is to be proposed. This subsection may be waived by a majority of the members present. This subsection shall apply only when at least 72 hours written notice of a session to mark-up a measure is provided to the Committee.

F. Agency comments. When the Committee has scheduled and publicly announced a markup meeting on pending legislation, if executive branch agencies, whose comments thereon have been requested, have not responded by the time of the announcement of such meeting, the announcement shall include the final date upon which the comments of such agencies, or any other agencies, will be accepted by the Committee.

G. Meeting transcript. The Committee shall prepare and keep a complete transcript or electronic recording adequate to fully record the proceeding of each meeting or conference whether or not such meeting or conference or any part thereof is closed to the public, unless a majority of the Committee members vote to forgo such a record. (Rule XXVI, Sec.5(e), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

RULE 2. QUORUMS

A. Reporting measures and matters. Eight members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for reporting to the Senate any measures, matters or recommendations. (Rule XXVI, Sec.7(a)(1), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

B. Transaction of routine business. Five members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of routine business, provided that one member of the minority is present.

For the purpose of this paragraph, the term "routine business" includes the convening of a meeting and the consideration of any business of the Committee other than reporting to the Senate any measures, matters or recommendations. (Rule XXVI, Sec.7(a)(1), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

C. Taking sworn testimony. Two members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for taking sworn testimony provided, however, that one member of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for such purpose, with the approval of the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee, or their designees. (Rule XXVI, Sec.7(a)(2), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

D. Taking unsworn testimony. One member of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for taking unsworn testimony. (Rule XXVI, Sec.7(c)(2), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

E. Subcommittee quorums. Subject to the provisions of sections 7(a)(1) and (2) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Subcommittees of this Committee are authorized to establish their own quorums for the transaction of business and the taking of sworn testimony.

F. Proxies prohibited in establishment of quorum. Proxies shall not be considered for the establishment of a quorum.

RULE 3. VOTING

A. Quorum required. Subject to the provisions of subsection (E), no vote may be taken by the Committee, or any Subcommittee thereof, on any measure or matter unless a quorum, as prescribed in the preceding section, is actually present.

B. Reporting measures and matters. No measure, matter or recommendation shall be reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Committee members are actually present, and the vote of the Committee to report a measure or matter shall require the concurrence of a majority of those members who are actually present at the time the vote is taken. (Rule XXVI, Sec.7(a)(1) and (3), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

C. Proxy voting. Proxy voting shall be allowed on all measures and matters before the Committee, or any Subcommittees thereof, except that, when the Committee, or any Subcommittee thereof, is voting to report a measure or matter, proxy votes shall be allowed solely for the purposes of recording a member's position on the pending question and then, only if the absent Committee members has been informed of the matter on which he is being recorded and has affirmatively requested that he be so recorded. All proxies shall be addressed to the chairman of the Committee and filed with the chief clerk thereof, or to the chairman of the Subcommittee and filed with the clerk thereof, as the case may be. All proxies shall be in writing and shall contain sufficient reference to the pending matter as is necessary to identify it and to inform the Committee as to how the member establishes his vote to be recorded thereon. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 7(a)(3) and 7(c)(1), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

D. Announcement of vote. (1) Whenever the Committee by rollcall vote reports any measure or matter, the report of the Committee upon such a measure or matter shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor of and the votes cast in opposition to such measure or matter by each member of the Committee. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 7(c), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

(2) Whenever the Committee by rollcall vote acts upon any measure or amendment thereto, other than reporting a measure or matter, the results thereof shall be announced in the Committee report on that measure unless previously announced by the Committee, and such announcement shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor of and the votes cast in opposition to each such measure and amendment thereto by each member of the Committee who was present at the meeting. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 7(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

(3) In any case in which a rollcall vote is announced, the tabulation of votes shall state separately the proxy vote recorded in favor of, and in opposition to that measure, amendment thereto, or matter. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 7 (b) and (c), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

E. Polling. (1) The Committee may poll (a) internal Committee matters including the Committee's staff, records and budget; (b) steps in an investigation, including issuance of subpoenas, applications for immunity orders, and requests for documents from agencies; and (c) other Committee business other than a vote on reporting to the Senate any measures, matters or recommendations or a vote on closing a meeting or hearing to the public.

(2) The chairman, or a Committee member or staff officer designated by him, shall undertake any poll of the members of the Committee. If any member requests, any matter to be polled shall be held for meeting rather than being polled. The chief clerk of the Committee shall keep a record of polls; if a majority of the members of the Committee determine that the polled matter is in one of the areas enumerated in subsection (D) of Rule 1, the record of the poll shall be confidential. Any Committee member may move at the Committee meeting following the poll for a vote on the polled decision, such motion and vote to be subject to the provisions of subsection (D) of Rule 1, where applicable.

RULE 4. CHAIRMANSHIP OF MEETING AND HEARINGS

The chairman shall preside at all Committee meetings and hearings except that he shall designate a temporary chairman to act in his place if he is unable to be present at a scheduled meeting or hearing. If the chairman (or his designee) is absent ten minutes after the scheduled time set for a meeting or hearing, the senior Senator present of the chairman's party shall act in his stead until the chairman's arrival. If there is no member of the chairman's party present, the senior Senator of the Committee minority present, with the prior approval of the chairman, may open and conduct the meeting or hearing until such time as a member of the majority arrives.

RULE 5. HEARINGS AND HEARINGS PROCEDURES

A. Announcement of hearings. The Committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall make public announcement of the date, time and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week in advance of such hearing, unless the Committee, or Subcommitte, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 4(1), Standing Rules of the Senate).

B. Open hearings. Each hearing conducted by the Committee, or any Subcommitee thereof, shall be open to the public, except that a hearing or series of hearings on the same subject for a period of no more than fourteen calendar days may be closed to the public on a motion made and seconded to go into closed session to discuss only whether the matters enumerated in clauses (1) through (6) below would require the hearing to be closed, followed immediately by a record vote in open session by a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee members when it is detemined that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such hearing or hearings—

(1) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of foreign relations of the United States;

(2) will relate solely to matters of Committee or Subcommittee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure;

(3) will tend to charge an individual with crime or misconduct, to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual;

(4) will disclose the identity of an informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement;

(5) will disclose information relating to the trade secrets of financial or commercial information pertaining specifically to a given person if—

(A) an Act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(B) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person; or

(6) may divulge matters required to be kept confidential under other provisions of law or Government regulations. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 5(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

Notwithstanding the foregoing, whenever disorder arises during a Committee meeting that is open to the public, or any demonstration of approval or disapproval is indulged in by any person in attendance at any such meeting, it shall be the duty of the chairman to enforce order on his own initiative and without any point of order being made by a member of the Committee; provided, further, that when the chairman finds it necessary to maintain order, he shall have the power to clear the room, and the Committee may act in closed session for so long as there is doubt of the assurance of order. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 5(d), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

C. Full Committee subpoenas. The chairman, with the approval of the ranking minority member of the Committee, is authorized to subpoena the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records, or any other materials, provided that the chairman may subpoena attendance or production without the approval of the ranking minority member where the chairman or a staff officer designated by him has not received notification from the ranking minority member or a staff officer designated by him of disapproval of the subpoena within 72 hours, excluding Saturdays and Sundays, of being notified of the subpoena. If a subpoena is disapproved by the ranking minority member as provided in this subsection, the subpoena may be authorized by vote of the members of the Committee. When the Committee or chairman authorizes subpoenas, subpoenas may be issued upon the signature of the chairman or any other member of the Committee designated by the chairman.

D. Witness counsel. Counsel retained by any witness and accompanying such witness shall be permitted to be present during the testimony of such witness at any public or executive hearing, and to advise such witness while he or she is testifying, or his or her legal rights, provided, however, that any government officer or employee being interrogated by the staff or testifying before the Committee and electing to have his personal counsel present shall not be permitted to select such counsel from the employees or officers of any governmental agency. This subsection shall not be construed to excuse a witness from testifying in the event his counsel is ejected for conducting himself in such manner so as to prevent, impede, disrupt, object or interfere with the orderly administration of the hearings; nor shall this subsection be construed as authorizing counsel to coach the witness or answer for the witness. The failure of any witness to secure counsel shall not excuse such witness from attendance in response to subpoena.

E. Witness transcripts. An accurate electronic or stenographic record shall be kept of the testimony of all witnesses in executive and public hearings. The record of his or her testimony whether in pubic or executive session shall be made available for inspection by the witness or his or her counsel under Committee supervision; a copy of any testimony given in public session or that part of the testimony given by the witness in executive session and subsequently quoted or made part of the record in a public session shall be made available to any witness at his or her expense if he or she so requests. Upon inspecting his or her transcript, within a time limit set by the chief clerk of the Committee, a witness may request changes in testimony to correct errors of transcription and grammatical errors; the chairman or a staff officer designated by him shall rule on such requests.

F. Impugned persons. Any person whose name is mentioned or is specifically identified, and who believes that evidence presented, or comment made by a member of the Committee or staff officer, at a public hearing or at a closed hearing concerning which there have been public reports, tends to impugn his or her character or adversely affect his or her reputation may:

(2) file a sworn statement of facts relevant to the evidence or comment, which statement shall be considered for placement in the hearing record by the Committee;

(b) request the opportunity to appear personally before the Committee to testify in his or her own behalf, which request shall be considered by the Committee; and

(c) submit questions in writing which he or she requests be used for the cross-examination of other witnesses called by the Committee, which questions shall be considered for use by the Committee.

G. Radio, television, and photography. The Committee, or any Subcommittee thereof, may permit the proceedings of hearings which are open to the public to be photographed and broadcast by radio, television or both, subject to such conditions as the Committee, or Subcommittee, may impose. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 5(c), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

H. Advance statements of witnesses. A witness appearing before the Committee, or any Subcommittee thereof, shall provide 100 copies of a written statement and an executive summary or synopsis of his proposed testimony at least 48 hours prior to his appearance. This requirement may be waived by the chairman and the ranking minority member following their determination that there is good cause for failure of compliance. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 4(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

I. Minority witnesses. In any hearings conducted by the Committee, or any Subcommittee thereof, the minority members of the Committee shall be entitled, upon request to the chairman by a majority of the minority to call witnesses of their selection during at least one day of such hearings. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 4(d), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

J. Full Committee depositions. Depositions may be taken prior to or after a hearing as provided in this subsection.

(1) Notices for the taking of depositions shall be authorized and issued by the chairman, with the approval of the ranking minority member of the Committee, provided that the chairman may initiate depositions without the approval of the ranking minority member where the chairman or a staff officer designated by him has not received notification from the ranking minority member or a staff officer designated by him of disapproval of the deposition within 72 hours, excluding Saturdays and Sundays, of being notified of the deposition notice. If a deposition notice is disapproved by the ranking minority member as provided in this subsection, the deposition notice may be authorized by a vote of the members of the Committee. Committee deposition notices shall specify a time and place for examination, and the name of the staff officer or officers who will take the deposition. Unless otherwise specified, the deposition shall be in private.

(2) Witnesses may be accompanied at a deposition by counsel to advise them of their rights.

(3) Oaths at depositions may be administered by an individual authorized by local law to administer oaths. Questions shall be propounded orally by Committee staff. If a witness objects to a question and refuses to testify, the objection shall be noted for the record and the Committee staff may proceed with the remainder of the deposition.

(4) The Committee staff shall see that the testimony is transcribed or electronically recorded (which may include audio or audio/video recordings). If it is transcribed, the witness shall be furnished with a copy for review. No later than five days thereafter, the witness shall return a signed copy, and the staff shall enter the changes, if any, requested by the witness in accordance with subsection (E). If the witness fails to return a signed copy, the staff shall note on the transcript the date a copy was provided and the failure to return it. The individual administering the oath shall certify on the transcript that the witness was duly sworn in his presence, the transcriber shall certify that the transcript is a true record of the testimony, and the transcript shall then be filed with the chief clerk to the Committee. Committee staff may stipulate with the witness to changes in the procedure; deviations from this procedure which do not substantially impair the reliability of the record shall not relieve the witness from his obligation to testify truthfully.

RULE 6. COMMITTEE REPORTING PROCEDURES

A. Timely filing. When the Committee has ordered a measure or matter reported, following final action the report thereon shall be filed in the Senate and the earliest practicable time. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 10(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

B. Supplemental, minority, and additional views. A member of the Committee who gives noice of his intention to file supplemental, minority or additional views at the time of final Committee approval of a measure or matter, shall be entitled to not less than three calendar days in which to file such views, in writing, with the chief clerk of the Committee. Such views shall then be included in the Committee report and printed in the same volume, as a part, thereof, and their inclusion shall be noted on the cover of the report. In the absence of timely notice, the Committee report may be filed and printed immediately without such views. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 10(c), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

C. Notice by Subcommittee chairmen. The chairman of each Subcommittee shall notify the chairman in writing whenever any measure has been ordered reported by such Subcommittee and is ready for consideration by the full Committee.

D. Draft reports of Subcommittee. All draft reports prepared by Subcommittee of this Committee on any measure or matter referred to it by the chairman, shall be in the form, style, and arrangement required to conform to the applicable provisions of the Standing Rules of the Senate, and shall be in accordance with the established practices followed by the Committee. Upon completion of such draft reports, copies thereof shall be filed with the chief clerk of the Committee at the earliest practicable time.

E. Impact statements in reports. All Committee reports, accompanying a bill or joint resolution of a public character reported by the Committee, shall contain (1) an estimate, made by the Committee, of the costs which would be incurred in carrying out the legislation for the then current fiscal year and for each of the next five years thereafter (or for the authorized duration of the proposed legislation, if less than five years); (2) a comparison of such cost estimates with any made by a Federal agency; or (3) a statement of the reasons for failure by the Committee to comply with these requirements as impracticable, in the event of inability to comply therewith. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 11(a), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

Each such report shall also contain an evaluation, made by the Committee, of the regulatory impact which would be incurred in carrying out the bill or joint resolution. The evaluation shall include (a) an estimate of the numbers of individuals and businesses who would be regulated and a determination of the groups and classes of such individuals and businesses, (b) a determination of the economic impact of such regulation on the individuals, consumers, and businesses affected, (c) a determination of the impact on the personal privacy of the individuals affected, and (d) a determination of the amount of paperwork that will result from the regulations to be promulgated pursuant to the bill or joint resolution, which determination may include, but need not be limited to, estimates of the amount of time and financial costs required of affected parties, showing whether the effects of the bill or joint resolution could be substantial, as well as reasonable estimates of the record keeping requirements that may be associated with the bill or joint resolution. Or, in lieu of the forgoing evaluation, the report shall include a statement of the reasons for failure by the Committee to comply with these requirements as impracticable, in the event of inability to comply therewith. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 11(b), Standing Rules of the Senate.)

RULE 7. SUBCOMMITTEES AND SUBCOMMITTEE PROCEDURES

A. Regularly establish Subcommittee. The Committee shall have five regularly established Subcommittees. The Subcommittees are as follows:

Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations;

Government Information and Regulation;

General Services, Federalism, and the District of Columbia;

Oversight of Government Management; and Federal Services, Post Office, and Civil Service.

B. Ad hoc Subcommittees. Following consultation with the ranking minority member, the chairman shall, from time to time, establish such ad hoc Subcommittees as he deems necessary to expedite Committee business.

C. Subcommittee membership. Following consultation with the majority members, and the ranking minority member of the Committee, the chairman shall announce selections for membership on the Subcommittees referred to in paragraphs A and B, above.

D. Subcommittee meetings and hearings. Each Subcommittee of this Committee is authorized to establish meeting dates and adopt rules not inconsistent with the rules of the Committee except as provided in Rules 7(E).

E. Subcommittee subpoenas. Each Subcommittee is authorized to adopt rules concerning subpoenas which need not be consistent with the rules of the Committee; provided, however, that in the event the Subcommittee authorizes the issuance of a subpoena pursuant to its own rules, a written notice of intent to issue the subpoena shall be provided to the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee, or staff officers designated by them, by the Subcommittee chairman or a staff officer designated by him immediately upon such authorization, and no subpoena shall issue for at least 48 hours, excluding Saturdays and Sundays, from delivery to the appropriate offices, unless the chairman and ranking minority member waive the 48 hour waiting period or unless the Subcommittee chairman certifies in writing to the chairman and ranking minority member that, in his opinion, it is necessary to issue a subpoena immediately.

[E] F. Subcommittee budgets. Each Subcommittee of this Committee, which requires authorization for the expenditure of funds for the conduct of inquiries and investigations, shall file with the chief clerk of the Committee, not later than January 10 of that year, its request for funds for the 12-month period beginning on March 1 and extending through and including the last day of February of the following year. Each such request shall be submitted on the budget form prescribed by the Committee on Rules and Administration, and shall be accompanied by a written justification addressed to the chairman of the Committee, which shall include (1) a statement of the Subcommittee's area of activities, (2) its accomplishments during the preceding year, and (3) a table showing a comparison between (a) the funds authorized for expenditure during the preceding year, (b) the funds actually expended during that year, (c) the amount requested for the current year, and (d) the number of professional and clerical staff members and consultants employed by the Subcommittee during the preceding year and the number of such personnel requested for the current year. (Rule XXVI, Sec. 9, Standing Rules of the Senate.)

RULE 8. CONFIRMATION STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES

A. Standards. In considering a nomination, the Committee shall inquire into the nominee's experience, qualifications, suitability, and integrity to serve in the position to which he or she has been nominated. The Committee shall recommend confirmation, upon finding that the nominee has the necessary integrity and is affirmatively qualified by reason of training, education, or experience to carry out the functions of the office to which he or she was nominated.

B. Information Concerning the Nominee. As a requirement of confirmation, each nominee shall submit on forms prepared by the Committee the following information:

(1) A detailed biographical resume which contains information relating to education, employment and achievements;

(2) Financial information, including a financial statement which lists assets and liabilities of the nominee and tax returns for the 3 years preceding the time of his or her nomination; and

(3) Copies of other relevant documents requested by the Committee, such as a proposed blind trust agreement.

At the request of the chairman or the ranking minority member, a nominee shall be required to submit a certified financial statement compiled by an independent auditor.

Information received pursuant to this subsection shall be made available for public inspection; provided, however, that tax returns shall, after review by persons designated in subsection (C) of this rule, be placed under seal to ensure confidentiality.

C. Procedures for Committee inquiry. The Committee shall conduct an inquiry into the experience, qualifications, suitability and integrity of nominees, and shall give particular attention to the following matters:

(1) A review of the biographical information provided by the nominee, including, but not limited to, any professional activities related to the duties of the office to which he or she is nominated;

(2) A review of the financial information provided by the nominee, including tax returns for the three years preceding the time of his or her nomination;

(3) A review of any actions, taken or proposed by the nominee, to remedy conflicts of interest; and

(4) A review of any personal or legal matter which may bear upon the nominee's qualifications for the office to which he or she is nominated.

For the purpose of assisting the Committee in the conduct of this inquiry, a majority investigator or investigators shall be designated by the chairman and a minority investigator or investigators shall be designated by the ranking minority member. The chairman, ranking minority member, other members of the Committee and designated investigators shall have access to all investigative reports on nominees prepared by any Federal agency, except that the chairman and the ranking minority member shall review the report of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which may also be reviewed upon request by any other member of the Committee. The Committee may request the assistance of the General Accounting Office and any other such expert opinion as may be necessary in conducting its review of information provided by nominees.

D. Report on the Nominee. After a review of all information pertinent to the nomination, a confidential report on the nominee shall be submitted to the chairman and the ranking minority member. The report shall detail any unresolved or questionable matters that have been raised during the course of the inquiry. Copies of all relevent documents and forms, except any tax returns, submitted pursuant to subsection (B) and any report of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, shall be attached to the report. The report shall be kept in the Committee office for the inspection by members of the Committee.

E. Hearings. The Committee shall conduct a public hearing during which the nominee shall be called to testify under oath on all matters relating to his or her suitability for office, including the policies and programs which he or she will pursue while in that position. No hearing shall be held until at least 72 hours after the following events have occurred: the nominee has responded to pre-hearing questions submitted by the Committee; and the report required by subsection (D) has been submitted to the chairman and ranking minority member, and is made available for inspection by members of the Committee.

F. Action on confirmation. A mark-up on a nomination shall not occur on the same day that the hearing on the nominee is held. In order to assist the Committee in reaching a recommendation on confirmation, the staff may make an oral presentation to the Committee at the mark-up, factually summarizing the nominee's background and the steps taken during the prehearing inquiry.

G. Application. The procedures contained in subsections (C), (D), (E), and (F) of this rule shall apply to persons nominated by the President to positions requiring their fulltime service. At the discretion of the chairman and ranking minority member, those procedures may apply to persons nominated by the President to serve on a part-time advisory basis.●

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, in accordance with rule XXVI of the Senate concerning committee procedure, I submit for the RECORD the rules of the Committee on Environment and Public Works for the 101st Congress.

The committee rules follow:

RULES OF PROCEDURE OF THE COMMITTEE

Rule 1. Regular Meeting Days.—The regular meeting day of the committee shall be the first and third Thursday of each month at 10:00 A.M., except that if there be no business before the committee, the regular meeting shall be omitted.

Rule 2. Committee Meetings.—Subject to section 133(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, committee meetings for the conduct of business, for the purpose of holding hearings, or for any other purpose, shall be called by the chairman, after consultation with the ranking minority member. Subcommittee meetings shall be called by the chairman of the respective subcommittee, after consultation with the ranking minority member. Notice of a meeting and the agenda of business to be discussed by the committee will be provided to all members not less than twenty-four hours in advance of such meeting. Additions to the agenda after that time may be made with the concurrence of the ranking minority member. Such 24-hour notice may be waived in an emergency by the chairman, with the concurrence of the ranking minority member.

Rule 3. Open Committee Meetings and Legislative Mark-up Sessions.—Meetings of the committee, including hearings, and legislative mark-ups, shall be open to the public, except that a portion or portions of any such meeting may be closed to the public if the committee determines by record vote of a majority of the members of the committee present that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such portion or portions—

(1) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States;

(2) will relate solely to matters of committee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure; or

(3) constitute any other grounds for closure under paragraph 5(b) of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate (as amended by Senate Resolution 9, 94th Congress).

Rule 4. Presiding Officer.—(a) The chairman shall preside at all meetings and hearings of the committee except that in the absence of the chairman the ranking majority member who is present at the meeting shall preside.

(b) Subcommittee chairmen shall preside at all meetings and hearings of their respective subcommittees, except that in the absence of the subcommittee chairman, the ranking majority member of the subcommittee who is present at the meeting shall preside.

(c) Notwithstanding the rule prescribed by subsections (a) and (b), any member of the committee may preside over the conduct of a hearing.

Rule 5. Quorums.—(a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (d), five members, two of whom shall be members of the minority party, shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of business, except for the purpose of reporting any measure or matter.

(b) Quorums for the conduct of business by the subcommittees shall be a simple majority of the membership of the subcommittees with at least one minority member present.

(c) Once a quorum as prescribed in subsections (a) and (b) has been established for the conduct of business, the committee may continue to conduct business.

(d) Notwithstanding the rule prescribed in subsection (a), one member shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of conducting a hearing.

Rule 6. Proxy Voting.—(a) Proxy voting shall be allowed on all measures, amendments, resolutions, or any other issue before the committee or any subcommittees. Any member who is unable to attend the meeting may submit a vote on any such issue, in writing or through personal instructions; however, proxies shall not be voted for the purpose of reporting any measure or matter except when the absent committee member has been informed of the matter on which the vote is being recorded and has affirmatively requested that such vote be so recorded. A proxy given in writing shall be valid until revoked, while a proxy given orally or by personal instructions is valid only on the day given.

(b) At the discretion of the chairman, after consultation with the ranking minority member, members who are unable to be present and whose vote has not been cast by proxy may have their positions recorded on any vote on the same business day so long as the vote will not change the outcome.

Rule 7. Public Announcement of Vote.—Whenever the committee, by rollcall vote, reports any measure or matter, or acts upon any measure or amendments thereto, the report of the committee on such measure or matter shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor of and the votes cast in opposition to such measure or matter by each member of the committee.

Rule 8. Announcement of Hearing.—The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall make public announcement and provide notice to members of the date, place, time, and subject matter of any hearings to be conducted on any measure or matter, at least one week in advance of such hearing, unless the committee chairman, or subcommittee chairman, with the concurrence of the ranking minority member, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date, in which event not less than twenty-four hours notice shall be given.

Rule 9. Statements of Witnesses at Hearings.—(a) Each witness who is scheduled to testify at any hearing of the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall file a written statement of proposed testimony not later than noon of the last business day preceding the day on which such witness is scheduled to appear. At the time of appearance, each witness shall supply for the use of the committee or subcommittee, 25 copies of any prepared testimony or such greater number as may be requested in the letter of invitation. Except for witnesses from the Federal Government, this rule may be waived with regard to field hearings.

(b) The presiding officer at a hearing may have a witness confine any oral presentation to a summary of a written statement.

Rule 10. Regularly Established Subcommittees.—The committee shall have five regularly established Subcommittees as follows: Subcommittee on Water Resources, Transportation, and Infrastructure; Subcommittee on Environmental Protection; Subcommittee on Superfund, Ocean, and Water Protection; Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation; and Subcommittee on Toxic Substances, Environmental Oversight, Research and Development.

Rule 11. Subcommittee Membership.—Following consultation with the Majority Members and the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee, the chairman shall announce selections for membership of the subcommittees referred to in Rule 10.

Rule 12. Environmental Impact Statements.—No project or legislation proposed by the Administration shall be approved or other action taken on such project or legislation unless the committee has received a final environmental impact statement relative to it, in accordance with section 102(2)(C) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1970, and the written comments of the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, in accordance with section 309 of the Clean Air Act. This rule is not intended to broaden, narrow, or otherwise modify the class of projects or legislative proposals for which environmental impact statements are required under section 102(2)(C).

Rule 13. Project Approvals.—(a) Whenever the committee authorizes a project, under Public Law 89-298, Rivers and Harbors Act of 1965, Public Law 83-566, Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act, or Public Law 86-249, Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, the chairman shall submit for printing in the Congressional Record, and the Committee shall publish periodically as a committee print, a report that describes the project and the reasons for its approval, together with any dissenting or individual views.

(b) Proponents of committee resolutions shall submit appropriate evidence showing need for review or reports on river and harbor and flood control projects.

Rule 14. Naming of Public Facilities.—No building, structure or facility authorized by the committee, shall be named for any living person, except former Presidents or former Vice Presidents of the United States, former Members of Congress over 70 years of age, or former Justices of the United States Supreme Court over 70 years of age.

Rule 15. Building Prospectuses.—(a) The committee shall act on all prospectuses for construction (including construction of buidings for lease by the government), alteration and repair, or acquisition submitted by the General Services Administration in accordance with section 7(a) of the Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, and such action shall be completed by the date of May 15 during the same session in which such prospectuses are submitted to Congress. The committee may consider prospectuses submitted for alterations or repairs necessitated by emergency building conditions at any time during the same session of the Congress in which they are submitted. Prospectuses rejected by majority vote of the committee or not contained in any bill reported to the Senate shall be returned to the GSA and must then be resubmitted in order to be considered for action by the committee during the next session of the Congress.

(b) Reports of building project surveys submitted by the General Services Administration to the committee under section 11(b) of the Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, shall not be considered by the committee as being prospectuses subject to approval by committee resolution in accordance with section 7(a) of that Act. Projects described in such survey reports shall be considered for committee action only if they are submitted as prospectuses in accordance with section 7(a) and they shall be subject to the provisions of subsection (a) of this rule.

Rule 16. Broadcasting of Hearings.—Public hearings of the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may be televised or broadcast, or recorded for television or broadcast, upon notification in advance to the chairman through the staff director. During public hearings, photographers and other reporters using mechanical recording or filming devices shall position and use their equipment in such fashion as will not interfere with the seating, vision, or hearing of Committee Members or staff on the dais, nor with the orderly process of the hearing.

Rule 17. Amendment of Rules.—The rules may be added to, modified, amended, or suspended by a majority of the Committee Membership.●

TERRORISM HITS HOME IN CONNECTICUT

● Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, acts of terrorism appear to be on the rise throughout the world. Far too often in the news we learn of new terrorist actions taking the lives of innocent and unsuspecting people. While most of these incidents occur abroad, often their impact is felt thousands of miles away from the crime itself, and we are reminded that no one is completely isolated or insulated from terrorism. The recent bombing of Pan Am flight 103 clearly shows us just how far-reaching the effects of terrorism can be.

Unfortunately, a number of my constituents in Connecticut recently learned about the power and potency which terrorism has, even to those not directly involved in the incident.

A few weeks ago, Patrick Finucane was killed in his home in Belfast. According to reports, three Protestant paramilitaries broke into his home, shot him twice in the stomach and once in the head, and then proceeded to shoot his wife in the leg. Tragically, this whole incident was witnessed by their three young children.

Patrick Finucane was an attorney in Northern Ireland who represented people of all religious affiliations. Although he was a Catholic, he showed no preference to Catholics over Protestants. In fact, Patrick had a reputation for being apolitical. His recent decision to represent a member of the IRA appears to have precipitated his death. Even though Patrick treated this case like so many he had taken up before, apparently others did not approve of his work.

Patrick Finucane was killed for pursuing the duties and responsibilities of his profession. The right of an attorney to represent a client is fundamental right in modern day democratic societies. Those who decided that Mr. Finucane must die for his professional pursuits not only infringed upon his civil rights, but also needlessly took the life of a good and decent man.

This deplorable incident brings home the senseless violence taking place between Protestants and Catholics in Northern Ireland today. Cases of human rights abuses and killings are pervasive in this war-torn country. Needless killings and injuries occur to the innocent citizens of Northern Ireland all too frequently as the result of terrorist and counterterrorist activity.

I have nothing but sympathy for the members of Patrick Finucane's family who succeed him both in Northern Ireland and in Connecticut. I share their outrage and sadness about this senseless death. Hopefully, their relative's death will not have been in vain, but will instead help to highlight the urgent need to curtail the killings that terrorize Northern Ireland. I want to add my voice to the chorus of voices calling for representatives of England and Northern Ireland to seek common ground and put an end to the continued and needless bloodshed in Northern Ireland occurring today.

I firmly believe the United States must be a leader in the fight against terrorism. I hope that we will remain committed to our longstanding tradition of combating terrorists who threaten innocent people everywhere. Those who choose terrorism to advance their cause must be made to realize that it will not serve their ends. It is necessary for all nations to signal consistently and firmly that no positive results can be achieved through those violent methods. The ongoing conflict in Northern Ireland stands to remind us of the importance of persevering in our efforts to put an end to terrorism.●

MOVING PEOPLE NORTH

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the National Journal recently had an article titled, "Growing Old" by Jonathan Rauch, in which is discussed the problem and opportunity of immigration as part of the solution to the growing old that is occurring not only within the United States but with most northern countries.

It is interesting because it lays out some of the problems as well as the potential.

The United States admits more legal immigrants into our Nation each year than all the other countries in the world combined.

Immigration will continue to be part of the way the United States solves its economic problems, but there are problems with immigration and a dramatic shift in where the immigrants are coming from, as the chart that goes with this article suggests.

I ask that the portion of the article in the National Journal entitled "Moving People North" be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

MOVING PEOPLE NORTH

The Third World will have young labor; the industrial world will need it. The most direct answer is also the most interesting: move the people.

"Governments in rich industrial countries have nightmares about the costs of supporting their aging populations," The Economist, the British weekly, said in a recent unsigned column. "They should wake up to the idea of allowing more young foreigners to immigrate." Actually, many people in Japan and Europe are wide awake to immigration: The prospect of a large inflow of foreign workers is keeping them up nights.

The mix of political and economic forces here is volatile. The decline of the working-age population throughout the industrialized North is likely to put upward pressure on wages, particularly among younger workers, in the early decades of the next century. Those wages cannot but be attractive to great numbers of young workers in less-developed countries. But immigration, while relieving some labor-force pressures and providing more paychecks from which to pay social security benefits, can more than compensate by creating other social tensions.

Take Japan. In recent years, Japan has found itself coping with an inflow of illegal Asian labor; foreigners come in from the Philippines and other Asian countries under temporary permits or to study, and then often don't leave. "The incentives are fantastic," Dornbusch said. "It's a delicate problem, but the trend is going to be there. Someone has to do the crummy work, and that's what the poor were invented for."

In Japan, however, foreign labor is not greeted with open arms. "The Japanese have always had problems with this," economist Edward J. Lincoln, a Japan specialist at the Brookings Institution, said. "It's very difficult for large segments of the population living and working in Japan who are not Japanese." Non-Japanese are seen as threatening to ethnic and cultural homogeneity, which the Japanese set great store by. "Japanese put so much emphasis on being the same as others—on uniformity," Tokyo demographer Tsuya said.

Florida State's Serow said, "Japan does not have any history of population movement at all." To many Japanese, the idea of a large inflow of foreigners is unacceptable. A close observer of Japan, asking not to be named, said that the level of hostility to immigration there is "amazing." This makes it somewhat doubtful that Japanese will be able or willing to import foreign labor in anything like the quantities that would be necessary to smooth out the economic effects of the aging of the country's population.

European countries are not so insular. An inflow of Turks bolstered the West German labor force in the 1960s and 1970s (although now, with West German unemployment high, the Germans are paying Turks to leave). But many of the nearby sources of Third World labor—Turkey, North Africa—are from Islamic cultures that are alien to Europeans. A large inflow of Turkish labor, senior economist Norbert A. Walter of Deutsche Bank A.G. said, would be socially unsustainable: "It's not something we could live with."

The logical place to look for Third World workers headed to France is Algeria, a former colony that has often been called France's Mexico. In The Wall Street Journal, an anonymous French government official was recently quoted as predicting that in 20 years, an additional 25 million North Africans will be looking for jobs in Europe. "Will Europe be ready to accept this? Obviously not," the official said.

In a telephone interview from his office in Frankfurt, Walter said: "I think a large part of the solution has to come from immigration. And we have lost 15 years, already." Europeans, however, are clearly not generally thinking of immigration in a positive light. In France, the United Kingdom and West Germany, the foreign-born already make up 7-10 per cent of the population; anti-immigrant movements have cropped up all over Europe. "France is a very clear case," French economist Tapinos said. "There's clearly an antiforeigner sentiment." The extremist right-wing party of Jean-Marie Le Pen has been making gains on a stridently nativist platform.

The periods of high immigration into France, West Germany and other European countries have also been periods of high fertility, Tapinos said: "Society will accept a large influx of foreigners when the society itself is growing." But non-Communist Europe's population is not growing, and it working-age population will soon be shrinking.

Moreover, using imported workers to pay retirement benefits to the population at large is potentially touchy. An increasingly foreign-born, and in many cases nonwhite work force may not gladly pay benefits for growing numbers of elderly white retirees. And immigrants themselves get old; to support them, the inflow has to keep coming. The U.N.'s Horlacher said, "If you want to handle this through immigration, you're on a treadmill." Not many industrial countries have a tradition of a steady inflow of immigrants, year after year.

A few do, of course: Australia, Canada and—the powerhouse among them—the United States. The United States admitted a big wave of immigrants in the first three decades of this century; those people wove themselves into the fabric of American society and now make up 12 per cent of the elderly, according to the Census Bureau. The numbers coming here today are not so large, but they remain significant. Over the course of the 1980s, legal immigration will probably be about eight million, according to the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Before enactment of the recent immigration reform law, illegal immigration was probably on the order of another 200,000 or so a year. On average, the migrants are significantly younger than the U.S. population as a whole, with an especially large bulge in the 25-34 age bracket.

These young workers are not ignorant freeloaders. Far from it. "They clearly are working their tails off," Torrey of the Census Bureau said. Census data on foreign-born Americans in 1980 show that their rate of college completion was almost identical to that of natives (about 16 percent), that they were almost as likely to be working in professional jobs and that their household median income was 85 percent that of native-born citizens. A 1986 analysis by the Council of Economic Advisers found that immigrants "appear to pay their own way from a public finance standpoint" and generally add to growth of output and standards of living in the United States.

Particularly striking in recent years has been what Sewell of the Overseas Development Council calls the "Third-Worldization" of the U.S. immigrant stream. "Guaranteed," Sewell said, "if you go to the emergency room this weekend, it will be staffed by Third World nurses and doctors." In the late 1950s and early 1960s, half of America's immigrants came from Europe and fewer than 10 percent came from Asia; by 1987, the figures were virtually reversed. Most of the rest came from Central and South America. This is not surprising: The Third World is where the young workers are. And the United States, although not without resentments and nativist streaks of its own, is far more willing than most other industrial countries are to absorb them.

Alleviating the coming century's retirement burden by accepting Third World immigrants has the earmarks of a strategy particularly well suited to the American temperament. The savings approach to coping with the population's aging requires deferring consumption, which Americans, in sharp contrast with the Japanese, have shown in recent years they are not inclined to do. Immigration works right away: Immigrants are "instant adults," as Ben J. Wattenberg, a senior fellow of the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, put it. "That is one of the most profound natural advantages we have—that people want to come here," he said. "We're the only one of the major countries that has shown we can handle it."

But immigration has its costs. Assimilation can be an expensive process, economically as well as socially. Newly arrived immigrants, especially from the poorer nations of the Third World, often need training and education. "All these migrants will add to the rate of economic growth," economist Hale said, "but they may do it while they also lower productivity, because they have no skills, they have no education. What we lack, in my opinion, is the institutional framework to maximize the value from immigration." And to educate and acculturate large numbers of immigrants requires a big up-front investment.

In short, America will certainly get immigrants. Whether it will be able to make the most of them is another matter.

The table shows that the percentage of legal immigrants to the United States from the developed countries of Europe dropped sharply in the past 20 years, while the proportion from developing countries in Central America and Asia increased.

SOCIAL SECURITY IS A LIFE SAVER

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recently, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch had an editorial, "Social Security Is A Life Saver," which points out what Social Security is doing to lift many people out of poverty.

Before we start tinkering with Social Security, we ought to read this editorial. I regret that we do not have a similar antipoverty program for children and many others.

One of these days, this Nation will do the humanitarian thing and have a jobs program that can lift a great many more people out of poverty.

I ask that the Post-Dispatch editorial be printed in the RECORD and to urge my colleagues to read the editorial.

The editorial follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY IS A LIFE SAVER

A new study by the U.S. Census Bureau says Social Security does more to lift people out of poverty and equalize income among Americans than do the tax system and social welfare programs. This politically neutral study takes on added significance for the incoming administration and for Congress, both of which will search far and wide for ways to reduce federal spending in order to cut the $155 billion federal deficit.

Social Security definitely is one program that should not be touched, apart from the fact that reducing benefits would not allow the government to borrow any less money than before. The census study explains that reducing Social Security benefits would put millions of the elderly, the disabled and widows into the poorhouse, widening the income inequality between them and the rest of society.

The findings, moreover, should put a damper on attempts to sacrifice entitlement programs in general for the deficit's sake. While these programs don't lift nearly as many people out of poverty as Social Security does, they, too, are shown to be effective weapons in reducing income inequality between the poor and the affluent.

According to the study, over 15 million fewer elderly Americans were poor in 1986 because of Social Security. Due solely to these benefits, the poverty rate for the elderly stood at 14 percent instead of nearly 48 percent. This dramatic reduction ought to be proof enough for Washington not to tread on this program.

The study also belies the contention that the tax structure is a more effective vehicle for raising the income of the poor than entitlement programs are. The study said the tax system has had little impact on the redistribution of income. Or, as a Census Bureau official told the New York Times, "taxes do not reduce inequality nearly as much as government benefits."

Conservatives who argue otherwise also insist that non-cash federal benefits—ranging from food stamps to school lunches, from rent subsidies to health insurance—ought to be counted as income. To be sure, the nation's poverty rate would be much lower if these were counted—11.6 percent instead of 13.6 percent, the census study noted.

But even after non-cash benefits are counted, more than 25 percent of blacks and nearly 24 percent of Hispanics would still be poor. Put another way, the various welfare entitlement programs don't save everybody, but the poor in general would be a lot worse off without them.

The nation's elderly just received in the mail a card telling them that the Social Security program is financially sound and that the 39 million Social Security recipients can rest assured that benefits will continue to flow their way. Now the Census Bureau has added the most compelling reasons yet for Washington not to tamper with Social Security. To do so would mean destroying this nation's most effective weapon for reducing poverty and income inequality.●

MAKING A REAL PEACE WITH VIETNAM

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Washington Post recently printed an article by Frederick Downs, Jr., titled "Making a Real Peace With Vietnam."

Mr. Downs heads the VA's Prosthetic and Sensory Aids Service. He is not a diplomat, but he is a veteran of the Vietnam war who has written two books on his experience in Vietnam.

He writes movingly about the needs of that country.

Given Vietnam's greater independence from both the Soviet Union and China, it is long past time for the United States to enter into diplomatic relations with Hanoi and to work with that country on her problems and the POW/MIA question.

I ask that the Downs article be printed in the RECORD and I urge my colleagues to read it.

The article follows:

MAKING A REAL PEACE WITH VIETNAM: IN HELPING THEM HEAL THEIR WOUNDS, MAYBE WE CAN BEGIN TO HEAL OUR OWN

(By Frederick Downs, Jr.)

In a well-lighted room the rehabilitation center at Haiphong Harbor, Vietnam, rows of disease-crippled babies and children lay of mats along the floor, each surrounded by a physical therapist and family members. The older children, 3 years and more, stared at us with wide, fear-filled eyes. When the therapist manipulated their limbs, tears ran down their cheeks, but they would not cry out. The younger children and the babies, however, were crying their hearts out as the therapist worked their crippled limbs in the hope that their function could be restored. As I squatted next to a 3-year-old girl, her eyes round with pain, I wondered when I had last seen an American child who had had polio.

Earlier in my tour of the Ba Vi center north of Hanoi, I had fallen behind the group. Attempting a shortcut, I came upon a man dressed in black pajamas maneuvering on crutches along the overgrown jungle trail. He was about my age—the age of the average Vietnam veteran—and his right leg was missing above the knee. He reminded me of a scene 21 years ago when I was a second lieutenant in South Vietnam, patrolling Highway I south of Duc Pho. There I had seen another dressed in black pajamas traveling on the road, leg missing, swinging his body with crutches. I had felt deep pity for that man then, imagining how terrible life would be for him without a leg.

Now, as I watched the replay of that scene, I did not feel pity. I knew the inner determination that both the man I observed and I, now an amputee as well, had to have to survive. I knew that with the proper help he could learn to walk without crutches—but that the proper help would be slow in coming it it came of all.

My mission in Vietnam, as a member of a three-person team sent by presidential envoy Gen. John Vessey Jr., was to see if there was a way to increase the odds that men like this would walk again and that the children of Haiphong—and the thousands like them elsewhere in Vietnam—would face a less painful future.

We should think about Vietnam in this holiday season. America is not vengeful nation. One of the greatest sources of both our moral and economic strength has been our willingness to reconcile differences not only among ourselves and with our foreign friends and allies, but also with those who have once been our bitterest foes. The humanitarian effort with which I have been intensely involved for more than a year promises benefits, I believe, not only to that war-torn country but to the many Americans families who still await word of men missing in action or taken prisoner during the Vietnam war.

When, in 1987, President Reagan asked Vessey to become his personal POW/MIA emissary to Hanoi, it had become obvious that Vietnam had slowed its previous cooperation in dealing with these issues. Vessey met with Vice Premier Nguyen Co Thach in Hanoi in August 1987, and the two men agreed to make a fresh start by reconfirming pledges to separate humanitarian issues from the political differences between our countries.

The Vietnamese, however, had an additional concern. They felt that U.S. concern for humanitarian needs was one-sided, that it ignored the humanitarian needs of their own people, especially the largely untreated problems of the many survivors severely maimed during the war. With the president's authorization, Vessey agreed that, within our legal and policy constraints, the United States would facilitate private efforts to improve care for their disabled.

Following this agreement, Vessey sent teams of medical experts to Vietnam. Our team's mission, involving four trips thus far, was to review Vietnamese needs for prosthetics and orthotics—devices to replace or strenthen damaged limbs. Another team has made three trips to review disabilities among Vietnamese children.

These trips have not been pleasant excursions. Each time, we have learned more about the severe deprivation suffered by this struggling country of 66 million people. Vietnam is a land where the most basic equipment and services to rehabilitate the disabled are in pitifully short supply and where children die routinely from deficiencies in nutrition, sanitation, immunization and medical treatment.

Among those needing immediate help are 60,000 amputees, a few thousand spinal cord injured and 300,000 others with severe disabilities. To serve these people, there are seven rehabilitation centers with physical therapists, nurses and doctors. All of these people are skilled, dedicated health care professionals. However, they have practically nothing to work with. Medical tools and equipment, pharmaceuticals, nutritional supplements, drugs, vaccines—even the most basic tools and equipment—are totally lacking or in short supply.

To re-equip and supply the seven centers' prosthetic laboratories would require a long but, by the standards of America's rich medical economy, certainly obtainable list of supplies and equipment. The list, compiled by the Vessey teams, starts with the tools needed to fabricate artificial limbs and orthopedic braces (drill presses plus bits, socket coping lathes, leather-sewing machines, furnaces, band saws and so on). It proceeds through the chemicals and suppliers used in the making of the limbs (tons of acrylic, hardener and PVC powder to make the exoskeleton, aluminum to make sockets and braces and so on). And it culminates in the steel sheet required to build wheelchairs.

No one should imagine that the Vietnamese are sitting back and waiting for the outside world to help them. The evidence of their efforts—and the severe limitations placed on those efforts—are all around.

To reach the rehabilitation centers, for example, slightly-built mothers in black pajamas carried their crippled children on their backs along the narrow road. Some could make it in a day, but sometimes the trip took longer. A determined mother would carry her child for many miles on a trip that might take two or three days. With the child's arms wrapped around her neck, the legs grasping her waist, the woman, slightly bent over, would move quickly in that short stride used when carrying heavy loads. Her determined face would be set in the mold of mothers around the world grasping at straws in hope of helping their children.

At least one village in the north has been constructed specifically for those with spinal-cord injuries. After driving along a narrow, rough, dirt road, we entered the perimeter of the village on a cement roadway which ran through the village to the other end where the road became dirt again. The village was laid out in the shape of a large oval with houses distributed along branches radiating from the oval and ramps connecting the branches. All the paths were of cement so that wheelchairs could move easily along them.

At one end of the oval, a community building offered occasional movies and entertainment. There was no radio, and the TV did not work. Doctors asked us for medicine, particularly for vitamins and nutritional supplements for the patients. We spotted about 25 men in Vietnamese-style tricycle wheelchairs, many of them sharing their chairs with small children. The entire family of the spinal-cord patient had been moved with him into the village, where he would most likely spend the rest of his life. It seemed to me to be a dreary, monotonous life. There was nothing for these men to do except to roll to the edge of the village and look wistfully out across the wide expanse of rice paddies.

While the treatment and rehabilitation of the disabled were the initial focus of the Vessey teams' inquiry, the high incidence of disabilities among Vietnamese children called attention to the desperate need for improvements in preventive medical programs as well. As in much of the Third world, infectious diseases are the major factor in childhood mortality in Vietnam. Generally poor living conditions coupled with a low rate of immunization result in a population of children susceptible to the entire gamut of bacterial, viral and parastic diseases. Pneumonia and its complications account for one-third of childhood deaths. Malaria, diarrheal diseases, tuberculosis, rabies, plague, polio, measles, tetanus and leprosy are all being treated as facilities allow, but efforts are limited by shortages of vaccine, antitoxin and antibiotics.

Even if vaccines were available, Vietnam lacks the refrigeration facilities and transport needed to undertake mass immunization programs. In one children's hospital in Hanoi, newborn babies were fighting for their lives. I watched the mothers rocking their children in their laps and I imagined the horror of watching your child die for want of a single inoculation.

Hepatitis is rampant in Vietnam, with more than 10 percent of the population carrying the disease. It is frequently transmitting at birth from mother to child and ultimately results in high incidence of liver cancer. Active tuberculosis is rapidly growing throughout the population; unreliable tests discover only 50 percent of the infected adults and none of the children. Malaria is another major scourge, with 98,000 cases reported in Vietnam in 1987. An undramatic killer, malaria usually kills or stunts the physical and intellectual development of children under the age of 4. In Vietnam, this is viewed as a fact of life.

Nutrition problems not only increase susceptibility to infectious disease but directly provide the leading cause of infant morbidity. Vietnamese medical experts believe that 40 percent of all children in Hanoi under age 3 are malnourished. Protein and vitamin deficiencies cause blindness, dermatitis, rickets and slow physical and mental development. At one center, I saw a mother—sadly only one of many—whose crippled child was going blind from a lack of vitamin A. There was nothing she, or the clinic, could do.

It is important to point out again that these problems are not due to poorly trained or numerically inadequate health-care workers. Rather these men and women are limited by chronic shortages of Medical supplies and equipment. Moreover, the Vietnamese make the best possible use of the materials they have.

The main pediatric hospital in Hanoi, for example, has a program which focuses on educating mothers on how best to feed and care for their children. They have made clever use of minimal resources. One example is a specially designed plastic spoon with a big scoop on one end and a small scoop on the other. The mother is told that if her child has diarrhea, she should fill the small scoop with salt, the big one with sugar and put them into a cup of boiled water to feed the child. Education projects like this are essential to overcome age-old folkways. For example, if children have diarrhea, Vietnamese peasants traditionally do not give them anything to eat or drink.

The teams sent in by Vessey produced two reports which were distributed to private American humanitarian organizations for their evaluation. Many of those organizations have responded by proving prosthetic materials and equipment to existing rehabilitation centers, beginning surveys for possible construction of regional prosthetic facilities and sponsoring vists of Vietnamese specialists to observe our procedures and technology. One group is now planning a trip to Vietnam to do reconstructive surgery for children suffering from facial and other deformities. The State Department's desk officer for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, Michael Marine, is serving as a contact and coordinating point for anyone interested in helping the Vietnamese. A tax-exempt organization, the Foundation for Tomorrow, has also been set up to spearhead fundraising.

Although these efforts—and those of other countries and international organizations—are just the beginning of the response to help Vietnam, the resources currently available fall far short of the overwhelming needs of the Vietnamese, and official U.S. aid is dependent upon a Vietnamese withdrawal from Cambodia and a political settlement.

Vietnam provides us with a special chance this holiday season to remind ourselves of our humanitarian tradition. The initiative under way between our country and Vietnam is, I believe, supportable by all Americans. The families of our men still missing in action as well as the disabled child in Hanoi can benefit from the private generosity for which our country is so well known.

On a street corner in Hanoi near the Lake of The Restored Sword, I saw a blind man standing hesitantly on a curb. He was using a stick as a cane and was helpless until his friend returned to assist him. There are no white walking canes in Vietnam. There are no mobility programs for the blind in Vietnam and they, like the spinalcord-injured, are trapped within a very small environment.

Fear and ignorance contribute to the misery a disabled person must endure anywhere he lives in the world, including America. In one sense, Vietnam itself is like a disabled person among the family of nations.●

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I hereby submit to the Senate the latest budget scorekeeping report for fiscal year 1989, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in response to section 308(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended. This report was prepared consistent with standard scorekeeping conventions. This report also serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 311 of the Budget Act.

This report shows that current level spending is over the budget resolution by $0.9 billion in budget authority, and over the budget resolution by $0.4 billion in outlays. Current level is under the revenue floor by $0.3 billion.

The current estimate of the deficit for purposes of calculating the maximum deficit amount under section 311(a) of the Budget Act is $135.7 billion, $0.3 billion below the maximum deficit amount for 1988 of $136 billion.

The material follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE
Washington, DC., February 27, 1989.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The attached report shows the effects of Congressional action on the budget for fiscal year 1989 and is current through February 24, 1989. The estimates of budget authority, outlays and revenues are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of the most recent budget resolution, H. Con. Res. 268. This report is submitted under Section 308(b) and in aid of Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, and meets the requirements for Senate scorekeeping of Section 5 of S. Con. Res. 32, the 1986 First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget.

Since my last report, Congress has taken no action that affects the current level of spending or revenues.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. BLUM,
Acting Director.

ROSE AUSTRUMS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, it is in times of great danger and great sacrifice that heroes rise from the ranks of people who may view their tasks as ordinary, but are known to all of us as true heroes. I rise, Mr. President, to call to the attention of my colleagues such a person: Mrs. Rose Austrums.

During World War II Soviet Latvia was occupied for a time by German forces. In order to establish a hospital for the care of wounded Germans, troops ordered the evacuation of an orphanage run by Mrs. Austrums and four others. The orphanage housed 130 Latvian children and their evacuation placed the entire group on a perilous journey into Germany.

At first by bus to the Riga Harbor, then by ship, train, foot, and horse drawn carriage Rose Austrums held these children together as they traveled through a series of small German towns. The children suffered through disease, malnutrition, and the nightmares of war. One child even died.

But the courage of Rose Austrums prevailed and managed to keep her family of Latvain children and workers together. Her indomitable spirit spared those children tragedies others could not escape.

Today the children of Rose Austrum's family are citizens of the world in a variety of nations and throughout our own United States. Rose Austrums settled in Omaha, NE, and is now a vibrant member of her community.

It is people like Rose Austrums, those willing to help for no reward other than the mere satisfaction of doing their jobs, who must stand before this Chamber and this Nation as shining examples of courage and values. Mr. President, I ask that my colleagues, on behalf of this Nation, join me and commend her efforts.●

EDUCATIONAL TESTING REVEALS U.S. ROCK BOTTOM

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, one of the consistently stimulating forces on the American scene today is the president of the American Federation of Teachers, Albert Shanker.

Recently, his column that appears in the New York Times was about U.S. schools and the international mathematics and science tests.

What he has to say is significant, and I urge my colleagues in the House and Senate to read his column.

I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The column follows:

INTERNATIONAL MATH AND SCIENCE TEST—U.S. ROCK BOTTOM

(By Albert Shanker)

For those who thought A Nation at Risk could be dismissed as mere inflammatory rhetoric, a new report gives us the facts without the emotional tone. There's no doubt that our nation is at risk, according to a devastating study issued last week. The study, A World of Differences, compares the math and science performances of 13-year-old students from the U.S. and 11 other countries and Canadian provinces. The U.S. comes out rock bottom, not even close to the top group.

Both the math and science tests were designed to determine what percentage of the 13-year-olds could do problems at different levels of difficulty—indicating different levels of understanding and achievement. In math, the easiest and lowest level was the ability to add and subtract. All students did well at this, with 97% of U.S. students able to add and subtract, and all others scoring 98, 99 or 100%.

At the next level, the story was different. When students had to solve a simple, one-step problem by figuring out whether they should add, subtract, multiply or divide, over 90% of the students in eight of the 12 countries succeeded. But in the U.S., only 78% of the students could handle this task—the lowest percentage of any country or province.

The next test measured the ability of students to solve two-step problems where both addition and division are needed—like finding the average age of a group of students. Only 40% of U.S. students could solve these problems, while 78% of Koreans could. In five of the 12 countries, 65% of the students or more succeeded.

The gap gets wider as we test for "understanding concepts"—solving more complex problems and understanding measurements and some geometry concepts. Forty percent of the Koreans and 16-24% of students in six other countries were able to do these problems. But only 9% of American students and 7% of those in French Ontario were able to perform at this level.

At the highest and most difficult level—interpreting data from complex charts and applying mathematics learned in school to real-world problems—5% of the Korean students but only 1% of U.S. and most other nations' 13-year-olds succeeded.

The science results were similar. In all countries, between 96-100% of the students knew simple, everyday facts. But at the next level—applying simple scientific principles—seven of the 12 countries scored between 90-95%, while the U.S. and Ireland were lowest with 78% and 76%, respectively.

Even larger differences emerged at the next level—the ability to analyze experiments. Korea came in at 73% and British Columbia at 72%, while the U.S. had only 42%; Ireland, 37%; French Ontario, 35%; and French New Brunswick, 35%.

At the highest level tested—applying scientific principles—over 31% of British Columbian students and 33% of the Koreans showed proficiency, while in the U.S. only 12% did, with three countries below us.

Ironically, when the tested students were asked whether they thought they were good at math, only 23% of the Koreans—the highest achievers—said yes (perhaps due to cultural modesty). But 68% of U.S. students—the lowest achievers—answered yes! (We scored highest on immodesty.)

What are we to make of this? Marshall Smith, Dean of the School of Education of Stanford University, in a recent conversation about sciences, said the battle is lost in grades K-8. Very few U.S. students enter high school prepared to do high-school level science. Teachers in many elementary schools teach almost no science because they themselves have never taken a serious science course, have no one to turn to for help, have very little equipment or lab facilities, among other problems.

What is true of science is largely true of math. In many states, there are no math or science requirements for licensing elementary school teachers. Where they do exist, the requirements are satisfied by demonstrating skill at the lowest level—simple computation and knowledge of basic scientific facts. As students go on to secondary schools, they're most likely to be taught by math and science teachers who are not really math and science teachers; they're teachers of other subjects forced to teach math and science, which they're not prepared to do.

Testing is also implicated in the mess we're in. Most school systems put no emphasis on science because they spend most of their time on the skills measured by the standardized tests that determine their system's reputation. That means lots of time on basic reading and low-level math.

Some other interesting facts emerge from the study. With the exception of the U.S., all the other places have either a provincial or a national curriculum. Korea, which did the best, has a much longer school year—220 days. But British Columbia, which also scored very well, does not have a long school year—185 days.

Of great interest is the fact that Korea is the only place that does not rely on classroom lectures and textbooks alone. Starting there in the 1970s, "The main thrust has been to develop an instructional system that draws not only on classroom lectures and the reading of textbooks but also on multiple learning materials and an extensive and very sophisticated set of television and radio programs."

Given the importance of math and science for business and industry, for national defense and for the intelligent exercise of citizenship, the U.S. faces disastrous consequences if these results are not turned around. It will be very difficult to do because we aren't producing enough college graduates who know enough math and science to meet the needs of business, the military and the schools. This is one problem that no "Education President" can refuse to ignore.

The study was conducted by the Educational Testing Service, Princeton, N.J., using the techniques developed by the National Assessment of Educational Progress. The countries and provinces included were: U.S., Korea, French Quebec, English Quebec, British Columbia, English New Brunswick, French New Brunswick, English Ontario, French Ontario, Spain, the United Kingdom and Ireland.●

SUBCOMMITTEE WITNESS TESTIMONY ON SEMIAUTOMATIC ASSAULT WEAPONS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, on February 10, the Subcommittee on the Constitution, which I chair, held a hearing on the topic of semiautomatic assault weapons. Because of the large number of requests for witness statements from that hearing, I ask that the statements be printed in the RECORD.

The statements follow:

[From the Department of the Treasury, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, Feb. 10, 1989]

STATEMENT OF EDWARD D. CONROY ON DEPUTY ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR, LAW ENFORCEMENT

Thank you for inviting me to appear before this committee to address you on the subject of semi-automatic firearms and the obvious increase in firearms-related violence. This committee is well aware that seldom does a day pass when we do not hear of some firearms-related violence. Whether it be a drug-related shoot-out, a tragic, senseless shooting of innocent victims by a seemingly crazed individual or a gun battle between law enforcement officers and an armed career criminal, these types of incidents are seemingly commonplace and evoke the sensibilities of all Americans.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms is the law enforcement agency tasked with the responsibility for enforcing the Federal firearms laws and regulations. Let me state that ATF is totally committed to using these laws in the ongoing war on drugs and particularly drug-related firearms violence. Further, we are using the additional weapons provided by the Congress in 1984, with the passage of the Armed Career Criminal Act, to stop the repeat offender who is responsible for the increase in murders, robberies and aggravated assaults.

Unfortunately, the crazed random shooter whose actions can never be rationalized is another problem entirely. Because of the difficulty in pre-identifying these individuals, we must rely on observant and concerned citizens who report to police changes in behavior of individuals. Tipsters and firearms dealers are also very important, as they alert law enforcement officials when questionable individuals acquire firearms.

Fifteen years ago, police rarely encountered armed drug dealers. Today, it is a different story. Firearms have become status symbols and tools of the trade for drug dealers. The proliferation of quality, high-powered firearms is an ever-increasing problem for law enforcement. This proliferation is fueled by the drug dealers' proclivity towards firearms and their all to apparent propensity for violence. Local crime statistics reflect the increasing use of firearms in drug-related murders and homocides.

Violent incidents involving the killing of police have increased at an alarming level. During 1985 through 1987, 198 law enforcement officials have been killed in the line of duty by firearms.

In September, 1988, a Los Angeles police officer was killed by a suspect armed with an AKS rifle.

In December, 1988, a Dallas, Texas police officer was killed while making an undercover narcotics purchase. The weapon used was a TEC 9, 9 mm pistol.

The illegal trafficking and use of firearms is tied to the growing drug trade, and today's criminal is armed to kill. The weapons of choice range from the semi-automatic 9 mm pistol to the AR-15 semi-automatic rifle to fully automatic machine guns.

The following incidents are illustrative of the violence and the potential for violence that exists today.

March, 1988—9 murders occurred at a posse-operated crack house. The weapon used was an AR-15 semi-automatic rifle.

April, 1988—6 subjects who were part of a heroin trafficking operation were arrested in New York. 50 AR-15 rifles converted to function as machine guns were seized.

May, 1988—ATF agents in Los Angeles executed a search warrant at an alleged drug trafficking location. Prior to being arrested, one suspect fired 15 shots from an AR-15 at the agents.

June, 1988—ATF, DEA and the Houston PD executed a search warrant and recovered a converted MAC 11 with silencer and a converted AR-15 along with 198 kilos of cocaine.

August, 1988—ATF and DEA executed a search warrant and recovered a converted UZI with silencer and 13 kilos of cocaine.

September, 1988—ATF seized an AR-15 and a kilo of cocaine from a Crips gang member in Maryland.

December, 1988—6 family members were killed in Algona, Iowa, by shots fired from a Mini-14 semi-automatic rifle allegedly purchased through a newspaper ad.

December, 1988—A high school student armed with a MAC 11 type semi-automatic pistol shot 2 teachers, killing one. The pistol had been purchased from a licensed dealer by a relative.

December, 1988—Two suspects were arrested in Arizona in possession of 37 AKS semi-automatic rifles and 450 pounds of marijuana.

January, 1989—A Los Angeles Crips gang member was indicted for the possession of a converted M-11 with silencer that had been used in a robbery and homicide. The subject has two prior felony convictions.

January, 1989—An individual opened fire with an AKS semi-automatic rifle in a California school playground. Five children were killed and 30 wounded.

This list incident involving the AKS-47, semi-automatic rifle has raised a number of questions across the United States.

The senseless slaughter of children by a man wielding a sinister military looking weapon causes us to ask not only why but how. We have heard the firearm used in this tragedy described in many ways—assault rifle, para-military weapon, AK-47, AKS 47, AKS, AK47S and so forth. In terms of the Gun Control Act of 1968, as amended, these types of weapons are defined as rifles. The particular weapons in question happen to be "rifles" that function in a semi-automatic mode.

To purchase a semi-automatic rifle, an individual need only certify to a firearms dealer that he is not a felon or a fugitive from justice; not an unlawful user of or addicted to any controlled substance; never been adjudicated as a mental defective; that he is not an illegal alien; has not been discharged from the Armed Forces under dishonorable conditions and has not renounced his citizenship in the United States. The individual completes this firearms transaction form and is free to receive the firearm unless there is some state prohibition. Only three states currently have waiting periods for purchasing rifles.

The terms "assault rifle" or "para-military" weapons are not defined in Federal law. Generally speaking, "assault rifle" is a label attached by the manufacturer or by some military entity. "Para-military" weapon is a colloquialism that, depending on who is using it, can refer to anything from a firearm painted black or olive drab to a weapon employed by a group that follows a military-like regimen. Usually, it identifies a weapon that has been modeled—at least in appearance—after an already existing military weapon.

AKS is but one of at least eight model designations for the same semi-automatic rifle manufactured in China and imported into the United States. The AKS is a semi-automatic version of the AK-47, standard assault rifle of the Soviet Army since the 1950's. The AK-47 is a select fire weapon capable of firing 600 rounds per minute on full automatic and 40 rounds per minute on semi-automatic. The AKS and the AK-47 are similar in appearance. The AK-47 is an NFA type weapon, having been manufactured as a machine gun. The AKS is difficult to convert, requiring additional parts and some machinery. A firearms expert with the knowledge and aptitude, as well as the additional parts and necessary tools would take about 30 minutes to convert the AKS to fire fully automatic. The AKS is a semi-automatic that, except for its deadly military appearance, is no different from other semi-automatic rifles. As a matter of fact, the identical firearm with a sport stock is available and, in appearance, no different than other so-called sporting weapons.

There can be little doubt that increased firepower is now more available than ever before. The drug trafficker, the career criminal and the unstable individual—cued by whatever stimulus—are reaching for those firearms that he has seen portrayed in the media as the firearms of this particular ilk.

War movies use the M-16/AK-47 weapons, while other violent criminal movies endorse other types of firearms. Whether the media influences the types of firearms user we have been discussing, or this criminal element has influenced the types of firearms used in the media, can be debated. However, a point that cannot be debated is the fact that we are now, more than ever before, aware of the escalation of firearms-related violence and the increasing potential for firearms-related violence.

[From a hearing of the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Judiciary Committee]

TESTIMONY REGARDING NEED FOR REGULATION ON MILITARY ASSAULT WEAPONS

(By Daryl F. Gates, Chief of Police, Los Angeles Police Department)

PROPOSED REGULATIONS ON MILITARY ASSAULT WEAPONS

Our nation is confronted by an intolerable and growing threat to the most cherished right of our people—the right to life. That threat is posed by the proliferation of military assault weapons in the hands of criminals and crazies.

On January 17, Patrick Edward Purdy walked onto the crowded grounds of Cleveland Elementary School in Stockton, California, armed with an AK-47 military assault rifle and plenty of ammunition. He then sprayed the crowd of students with gunfire, leaving 5 innocent children dead and 29 others injured.

My Police Department has already lost two officers who were killed by assault weapons. Detective Thomas Williams was murdered in a drive-by ambush shooting by Daniel Jenkins on October 21, 1985. Jenkins, a hardened criminal, was armed with a MAC-10. Officer Daniel Pratt was killed in a drive-by shooting on September 3, 1988. The killer used an AR-15. Kirkton Moore, a violent gang member, is awaiting trial for the murder of Officer Pratt. I do not want any more officers to be spray-gunned to death by street punks armed with high tech killing machines.

I believe such weapons can be, and should be, legislated out of the hands of killers. The most formidable resistance to such legislation has come from those who hold reverent the right to bear arms. Those well-meaning people have in the past rallied in opposition to any proposed legislation that even hinted at gun control. I would say to those people that I, too, believe in the right to bear arms. I am not a gun control advocate, and I do not believe in general gun control. But recent events have convinced me that we all should stop thinking in terms of "Gun Control" and start doing something about "Gun Responsibility" and a reasonable right to bear arms.

The membership of the NRA is the largest, most vocal group of supporters of the right to bear arms. I believe that most people in that organization are ready to support responsible, restrictive legislation against assault rifles. In California, Ken DeChambeau, a lobbyist for the California Rifle and Pistol Association, which is closely affiliated with the NRA, has been quoted in the Los Angeles Herald Examiner as saying, "I'm willing to consider a compromise. The old rhetoric doesn't apply anymore. . . I'm willing to sit down with anyone reasonable and discuss ways of doing something. We've got to stop having dead children in our school yards."

I appreciate Mr. DeChambeau's realistic attitude and his honesty. I believe there are many more responsible men and women in pro-gun organizations such as the NRA and the California Rifle and Pistol Association who share those sentiments. With the help of these people, I'm sure that reasonable and workable laws can be passed.

The Second Amendment to the Constitution reads, "A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed." We should pay close attention to the words "well-regulated." The Second Amendment gives no more of an absolute right to bear arms than the First Amendment gives anybody the right to yell "Fire!" in a crowded theater.

A reasonable right to bear arms does not mandate that weapons designed and built for the express purpose of killing human beings on battle fields be made available to the general public. In fact, the general public is already prohibited by the National Firearms Act from owning most weapons built for that purpose. Also, the National Firearms Act strictly regulates access to other weapons, such as machine guns. Yet, through an error in judgement, we have allowed assault rifles to flow unrestricted across the counters of our gun shops and into the hands of too many criminals.

It is time to correct that error. Doing so will not be a "foot in the door" for gun control advocates. It will be a courageous and responsible move by reasonable people.

A coalition of criminal justice officials, including myself, began working last November on legislation to prohibit assault weapons in California. That legislation, introduced as California Senate Bill 292 (attached), would do several things. First, it would prohibit the sale, manufacture, and possession of all weapons that fall under a generic definition of "assault weapons," with certain specified exemptions. Next, it would create an Assault Weapons Commission whose task it would be to exempt other firearms when it is found that a particular firearm is a legitimate sports or recreational firearm. Finally, SB 292 would increase prison terms for those found guilty of using assault weapons in the commission of crimes. I strongly endorse this legislation and submit it as a model for similar Federal legislation.

The following additional points should be included in any new Federal legislation:

(1) The sale and manufacture of firearm magazines capable of holding 20 or more rounds of ammunition should be banned. This ban is necessary to ensure that exempted rifles and pistols aren't outfitted with the same deadly capacity as their outlawed cousins.

(2) Importing assault weapons should be prohibited. This is a logical step consistent with our own proposed restrictions on the weapons.

(3) Military assault weapons could be regulated by amending the National Firearms Act.

I urge the Congress to act on this issue—now! I believe that the majority of people who believe in the right to bear arms, as I do, will join with us in making it a reasonable right. Reasonableness means that a demented young man from Stockton cannot purchase an assault rifle across the counter at a local gun store, anywhere.

AK-47s, like the one Patrick Purdy used in Stockton, MAC-10s, like the one used to kill Detective Williams, and AR-15s, like the one used to kill Officer Pratt, are examples of military assault rifles that can be purchased right off the shelf in less than the time it takes to buy a pair of shoes. That ought to be a crime. I urge you to make it just that—a crime.

Attachment.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM PATTISON ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POLICE ORGANIZATIONS BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

ASSAULT WEAPONS

Distinguished Senators and Staff: My name is William Pattison. I serve as Executive Vice President of the National Association of Police Organizations which represents over 90,000 police officers from Alaska to Florida, from California to New England, on the local, state and federal levels.

In addition, I am President of the Superior Officers Association of Nassau County, New York.

By way of background let me say that I began walking a beat twenty-nine years ago on the Nassau County police force. I presently hold the rank of Sergeant. Ours is a police family in that my son is a member of the California State Police.

As I am sure you are aware Nassau County is a bedroom community of the Greater New York Metropolitan area. Nassau's population is approximately 1.5 million. Our police force is the ninth largest in the United States consisting of some 4,000 officers.

In its first decade of existence NAPO, the National Association of Police Organizations, has had one main goal, namely to serve as a national advocate for rank and file police officers so that their views might be conveyed effectively to federal lawmakers and officials who enact, administer and implement federal laws and policies. We believe that we have been a useful sounding board to the legislative bodies and federal agencies which have the awesome task of determining how life in these United States will be lived.

In our role of advocate, we want Congress to know that the hundreds of thousands of dedicated police officers in our land have come to recognize the brutal fact that our streets, which we are pledged to patrol and keep safe for our fellow citizens, have become combat zones in which drug gangs, paramilitary groups, and other criminal elements prey upon the public, armed with assault weapons manufactured at home and abroad for military purposes.

Even suburban Nassau County, which once enjoyed a reputation as having a low crime rate, is now beseiged with drugs of all kinds, drug trafficking and a huge supply of weapons. Our present crime rate is astonishing.

The availability of, and access to, assault weapons by criminals has become so substantial that police forces are being forced to upgrade the weapons supplied to police officers merely as a matter of self-defense and self-preservation. The six-shot 38 calibre service revolver of old is no match against a criminal with a semi-automatic weapon.

While it is necessary, we do not believe that improving the weapons provided to police is the solution to the problem of assault weapons.

Instead, we in NAPO are convinced that prompt and decisive action by Congress is required to deal with assault weapons themselves. At the NAPO Executive Board meeting in Washington, D.C. held on January 31, 1989, NAPO's Board adopted a resolution, a copy of which is attached to this statement, which calls for the enactment by Congress of a ban on assault weapons after consultation with law enforcement representatives and other interested groups.

We believe such a ban would be a step in the right direction. It will send a message to the country that we will not permit America to become a shooting gallery or an armed camp, and that as a nation we can reverse the violent course that America is traveling. We must take the suggestion of our newly-elected president and find ways to become a "gentler and kinder" society. We must end the maiming and killing of our children, our citizens and our police officers.

We wish to state further, however, that a ban on assault weapons would be but one step on a much larger road that lies before us in the area of crime prevention and drug law enforcement. We have already conveyed to every member of Congress by letter dated January 27, 1989, from our President, Robert Scully, our concern over the lack of funding in the area of drug law enforcement under the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. We wish to state clearly and unequivocally that much more must be done in the areas of law enforcement, employment opportunities, training, education, housing, and the like if this country wishes to avoid the establishment of a large, permanent, threatening underclass of criminals and drug traffickers who will destroy the civil peace and domestic tranquility that the Founding Fathers sought to establish and maintain on these shores over two hundred years ago.

Thank you for this opportunity to come before you.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POLICE ORGANIZATIONS, INC. RESOLUTION

Resolution adopted by the National Executive Board of the National Association of Police Organizations (NAPO) on January 31, 1989, Washington, D.C.

As a matter of policy, the National Association of Police Organizations (NAPO) believes that the ready availability of assault weapons constitutes a serious danger to police officers and other members of the public.

Therefore, NAPO believes that Congress should carefully consider and enact appropriate legislation to ban such weapons as the AK-47 and other assault weapons after consultation with law enforcement groups and other interested parties.

STATEMENT BY LORI MACKEY, TEACHER AT CLEVELAND ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

My name is Lori Mackey and I am a teacher of hearing impaired children at Cleveland Elementary School in Stockton, California. I am here to report the facts of the tragic and fatal shooting by a single gunman on January 17, 1989.

At 11:43, 400 children were playing during their lunch recess. Four to five minutes later, five children were dead, and 29 children and 1 teacher were wounded. Now 23 days later, 5 are still hospitalized with gunshot wounds. Until that day, recess was a time of carefree play for those children, and school was a safe place to come and learn. Today children at Cleveland Elementary still go out for recess. But now they look at passersby with suspicion and fear. My students are disconcerted every time the door to my classroom unexpectedly opens. They won't return to their work until I have assured them that the person at the door poses no threat. There are patched bullet holes in our building today, a reminder to these children and me every day of how vulnerable we are every time we gather to work, study, or play.

I'd like to tell you the story of what happened at our school that day. At 11:35 a.m., the intermediate children (grades 4-6) were in their classrooms for academic instruction. The 400 primary students were outside enjoying the sunshine, innocently playing during their recess. My class had begun a math lesson, along with five hearing students who had just joined us. It appeared to be a normal day.

At approximately 11:43 a.m., our lives were to be changed forever. A young man, Patrick Purdy, parked his old green station wagon just outside of our campus on the back street. He ignited a long fuse to a homemade pipe bomb to blow up his own car. Then he entered the campus through a back gate, walked up the walkway towards our portable building, crossed behind the building to the back corner of our room, faced the playground and began shooting at the primary children with an AK-47; a semi-automatic weapon.

At that time, I was with a majority of the children up at the front of the room. I heard the shots, and quickly assessed them to be firecrackers. Shortly after the onset of the "popping sound," I heard a more intense explosion. I thought that someone had tied several fireworks together in a bundle and that they had exploded in unison. As the sounds continued, I immediately got up and walked to the door. Looking out the window, I saw to my left, approximately 5 to 6 feet away, a young Caucasian male dressed in Army fatigues who was holding a large weapon at his hip facing the play yard making wide sweeps with his gun. The intense sound pierced my ears. The look on the man's face was that of deep concentration. He did not look angry or pleased, just determined—determined to hurt innocent children at play. That look is one that I will remember for the rest of my life! I turned towards the direction of the playground, and out an adjoining window, I could see the pandemonium that was occurring. Children were scattering in every direction—I could hear their screams from where I stood. I continued my turn towards the children in my class and immediately instructed them to get down and to crawl to the back of the room under the safety of a large table which was secluded from the window on the door. I prayed that he would not see us. Maybe in his craziness, he would just assume that we were out for recess, as well. Under that table, the children and I shuddered with each rapid shot. I grabbed the telephone to phone the office. When they answered, I begged for them to call the police telling the person on the other end that a man with a gun was outside of our room.

After a minute or so, the shots stopped. We were terrified that he would enter the classrooms to do additional damage. As we lay still, we watched his shadow through our four windows on the back wall. He walked past the back of our room. His journey to the other side seemed to have him moving at a snail's pace. On the east side of our building, he resumed his attack. He began shooting from his new position, again towards the playground. I immediately stood up to lock our door. "He would not come in to take us hostage," I thought. Apparently not satisfied with his "accomplishments", he once again traveled back to our side of the building to fire additional rounds! The children were terrified! As I looked at the children, the thought that I would never see any of them again entered my mind! Soon, the shots ceased and, for the last time, we watched him walk to the east side. At that point, we heard one isolated shot! Silence. We lay terrified. Had he entered one of the other classrooms? Had he taken the children hostage? Was he returning to our side? The silence was as deafening as the gunfire.

For twenty minutes or so, we sat in that silence. What was happening? Finally, a police officer came to the door and told us to stay hidden. He indicated that the gunman "had been shot over there," but there was a possibility of a second suspect. Were there enough officers on the campus to stop a second crazy man with a weapon powerful enough to kill and injure scores of people in a matter of seconds, I thought? The realization of what had happened, combined with this new fear of a second gunman, grabbed me. The tears started to fall; I could not be strong any longer. I can't explain the thousands of thoughts that went through my mind in those 20 minutes or so. What had any of these precious children done to deserve such hell? What had they done to this man to make him want to hurt them? What had any of us done to be devastated so terribly? How could one man, with one weapon, do so much damage to so many people?

While we lay there patiently awaiting our destiny I could hear helicopters and sirens all around us. As I peered out of the window, I could see the paramedics loading the children onto stretchers and administering medical attention as needed. Police and paramedics were everywhere. What kind of damage did this lone gunman do?

After approximately 20 minutes more, the police officers came to our door once again. They escorted us to an interior hallway where we were to wait for further directions. On the long journey across the playground, it was unavoidable for us not to see the bodies of three of the dead children lying on the ground covered with white sheets. The children wanted to know what had happened, but all I could tell them was that I didn't know, and that we shouldn't look. How could they be subjected to these inexplicable deaths at such a young age? How could I ever find the words to explain that children from their own school were lying before them—dead from the gun of a single gunman?

Since January 17, the lives of so many people have been drastically changed, not only in the population of Cleveland Elementary School, but in the entire community, in our state, our nation, and the world. The evidence of the impact is in the more than 500 letters that have poured into our school daily since that fatal day. Children from across the nation have written to express their sympathy and to say that they, too, are afraid to go to school now. We've heard from high school students whose concerns over this incident has prompted letters from them to their Congressmen and Senators. They wondered how a civilized society could allow anyone to purchase a weapon that can cause such terrible devastation. Parents have written of the fear that I, my family and friends, and the people in the educational community face . . . how can we protect our children who are so vulnerable to such a senseless act?

My students have demonstrated fearful behavior which was not apparent prior to the shooting. Their parents come to me daily with reports that their children are afraid to be in their bedrooms alone, afraid to sleep without a light on, and afraid of any stranger that they encounter. Nightmares are a regular occurrence. Anger rears its ugly head for no obvious reason. These are the effects on children who saw just the shadow of the gunman. They did not hear the gunshots, but only felt the vibrations of each round. They did not see their playmates fall to the ground around them. The children that were outside when the massacre occurred are faced with even greater devastation.

Personally, my life has been changed forever. In a matter of five short minutes, I am a different person. I will never look at things again in the same manner. Prior to my encounter with Patrick Purdy, I was a very trusting person. I looked at all people and saw good. Now, I look at each and every stranger with fear and suspicion. I jump at each loud noise, and cringe at each siren. My school, which has always been a peaceful haven for me, is now a place of fear and uneasiness. I once was able to sit alone in my classroom before and after school for great lengths of time to work on lesson plans, bulletin boards, and to meet with parents. Now, it is too frightening for me to be in the room alone. I enter the room with the students, and exit with them also. I worry that my effectiveness as a teacher will diminish, yet I can't find the strength to overcome my fears. I am not alone . . . these anxieties and fears live in each and every one of us at Cleveland School.

All of this alteration and destruction of lives was the result of one person—Patrick Purdy—who was able to plan the aggressive act, go to a store and purchase a semi-automatic weapon for the sole purpose of killing a large number of innocent, vulnerable human beings—in this case, children. It is quite obvious that his intent was not to kill merely 5 and wound 30 individuals. On his chest, he wore a weapon's pack filled with more than 300 additional rounds!

The teachers and staff that were present at the time of the shooting were quick to react, and risked their own lives to save the lives of these innocent children. Yet, why should we or any other person be placed in this position? We can't build a wall around us to protect ourselves from this type of cold, calculating murderer. Why aren't there laws to protect us from this kind of madness? Why are these malevolent machines even allowed to be produced and sold to anyone who has the money to pay for them? Only Congress has the power to pass a comprehensive law which will protect all citizens from a person who would purchase one of these weapons in one state and then travel to another to wreak havoc. Does it always have to take a tragedy of this magnitude to get any action? We at Cleveland School and the rest of the country want to know, "Has there been enough suffering to warrant action, now?"

TESTIMONY OF JOHN F. HANLON, JR., BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee: By way of introduction, I am John F. Hanlon, Jr., currently engaged in the private practice of law in Fort Lauderdale, Florida and soon to join the staff of the Florida State Attorney in Broward County, Florida as a prosecutor. Subsequent to my graduation from the Georgetown University Law Centre, I was employed by the U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation. During my Bureau career, from August, 1963 until November, 1987, I served in seven field divisions, and at F.B.I. Headquarters and held Special Agent Investigator, Supervisory and Executive positions.

On April 11, 1986, at Miami, Florida, I took part in what has been characterized as "the bloodiest day in FBI history." On that day, certain members of the C-1 Squad, the team charged with the responsibility of investigating bank robbery, kidnapping and fugitive matters, happened onto two heavily armed bank/armored car robbery suspects. These two, one armed with a twelve gauge shotgun and a 357 Magnum revolver and the other a Ruger Mini 14 Assault Rifle with 30 round "banana" clips of ammunition and a 357 Magnum revolver were suspected of committing a number of bank/armored car robberies characterized by ever escalating violence. During two of the robberies, guards were shot. One of the guards was shot twice as he laid on the ground, critically wounded. A third individual was killed and his automobile stolen. A fourth was shot several times at point blank range and his car stolen. Fortunately, this man survived. Before the investigation was completed, the two, William Russell Matix and Michael Lee Platt, were believed responsible for the deaths of seven people, including two FBI agents.

During the course of the shoot-out which lasted approximately four minutes, Platt, the man armed with the Ruger Mini 14 fired 45 shots, 42 of them with the assault rifle. It was he, armed as he was, who killed the two agents and injured the others. During the course of the shoot-out, Supervisory Special Agent (SSA), Gordon McNeill was wounded in the hand and head and left paralyzed in the street from a shot down through his shoulder and into his back, with fragments lodged against his spine. SSA McNeill who can walk, has no feeling from his chest down. Special Agent Edmundo Mireles was shot through the left arm, two inches of bone, muscle and tendons were blown away and he has been left with an almost useless arm. These two brave men are still on duty with the FBI. I was shot in the head, in the right hand and fingers, and suffered numerous fragment hits in the right arm and thigh. While trying to stem the flow of blood gushing from my right arm, I watched Platt stand between my legs and shoot me in the groin at point blank range. He then killed Agent Ben Grogen who fell at my feet. I heard his death rattle. He then shot Agent Jerry Dove who fell right next to me with his head some six inches from my face. Platt then shot him in the back of the head, execution style. Platt stood over me firing into the street. I thought his weapon was on full automatic due to the repidity of fire. Shell casings fell on my head and chest. Two other agents were injured slightly. Platt and Matix then got into the Bureau vehicle and attempted to flee. Agent Mireles so seriously wounded earlier, miraculously and courageously got up off the ground, walked up to the car and emptied his revolver into the two of them, thus ending the fight. Fortunately, Matix only fired four shots, one from the shotgun and three from his handgun. Had he been similarly armed as Platt, with an assault rifle and was as active, none of us would have survived the carnage that day.

As you might imagine, there was much made of our actions on that day. We received numerous awards for bravery, and much favorable comment from the media and the public. All of this is fine and very much appreciated. However, it must be remembered that as law enforcement officers we were merely doing our job, the job we signed on for and the job the public has a right to expect. We did our duty, plain and simple and that is all.

While I am certainly flattered that my views have been sought on such an important piece of gun control legislation as that restricting the sale of assault type weapons, I really do not believe that I can tell this distinguished panel anything that they do not already know. Simply put, the United States of America, supposedly the most civilized nation in the industrialized world, has become through the proliferation of weaponry of all kinds and calibers as well as the spread of cheap, addicting drugs, an extremely violent and an extremely dangerous place in which to live and work.

In 1983, the Superintendent of Police for the City of Chicago, told a panel made up of ABC newsmen, including David Brinkley, George Will and the ever popular Sam Donaldson "We are an international disgrace when it comes to firearm violence." I felt this way even before the shoot-out in April, 1986.

The topic of gun control has been studied and studied and studied. Northeastern University in Boston, after a statistical study, found that strict gun control legislation cuts down on the utilization of guns during the commissions of crimes, including homicides. The Attorney General's Task Force Report on Violent Crime issued in 1981 found that crimes committed by armed individuals represented a severe problem of violence in this nation. The Task Force noted the ineffectiveness of federal legislation brought about by breakdowns in enforcement and unintended loopholes in the laws and called for broad, sweeping legislation.

Now we find ourselves in 1989 with ever increasing bloodshed and terror brought about by easy access to weapons. A month ago, in Dade County, Florida, a policeman in pursuit of an automobile had his cruiser sprayed with automatic weapons fire from an AK-47 assault rifle. In Stockton, California, a lunatic with a criminal background, armed with an assault rifle, killed a number of school children at play in a fusillade of bullets. What a tragic picture.

In the face of this, the gun lobby, lead by the National Rifle Association, probably the most powerful lobby in the United States, inundates us with a much different picture—a picture of a man, his boy and a dog, clad in camouflage hunting gear, walking through fields of newly fallen snow with long guns over their shoulders. This may be fine, but does the father and his son need an assault weapon, an AK-47, an M-16, a Ruger Mini 14 or a Mac-10 machine gun with 30 round "banana" clips of armour piercing bullets to "bag" a quail? I think not. Can a man and his son obtain such weapons, weapons that have no legitimate use? Certainly. Can the drug crazed career criminal obtain one? Certainly. All they need to do is walk into any gun store and find row after row after row. Platt did this when he walked into a Miami gun store ten (10) days before the shooting and bought the Ruger Mini 14 and 5000 rounds of ammunition. If he couldn't buy one, he could steal one out of a house, a car or a business establishment. Does the man and his boy have an absolute right to own or possess such weapons under the Second Amendment to the U.S. Constitution? Of course not. To argue otherwise is practically and legally laughable.

Gentleman, the effective control of weapons is needed and needed now more than ever. The people want it. The states alone cannot do this effectively. The federal government can and should, if it is willing, to take a tough stance against the gun lobby. Legislation restricting the sale of assault type weapons, weapons that have no legitimate use, is at least a step. Possibly this step can lead to sweeping gun control legislation which is concise, understandable and most importantly, effective. Such legislation would not only save thousands of lives, but would make America a safer place in which to live.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF BILL PRESS, NEWS COMMENTATOR KABC-TV AND KABC RADIO, LOS ANGELES

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee: My name is Bill Press. I am a news commentator in Los Angeles for KABC-TV and KABC Radio. I am honored to have a moment on your agenda this morning to make three brief but important points:

One. California is under siege from military assault rifles. Two. We desperately need federal legislation outlawing private possession and use of such weapons. Three. This issue is too important for the media to stay on the sidelines.

1. CALIFORNIA UNDER SIEGE

Semi-automatic assault rifles were designed for the battlefield. But it's not the soldiers on the battlefield who are their targets today. It's the men and women and children of California cities. Starting long before the Stockton schoolyard tragedy.

From the Los Angeles Times comes this list of 36 people killed—and many more critically wounded—in the streets of Los Angeles by assault rifles between January 30, 1988 and January 31, 1989. And the killings go on. On the evening of January 28, two-year old Philip Fisher was shot and killed by an UZI fired from a passing car. His uncle just happened to be in the frontyard, holding the little toddler in his arms.

Citizens of California are living in fear. No matter what community we live in, we fear for our lives. We can't even depend on the police anymore—they are the first ones to admit it—because, too often, the criminals and the gangs are better armed than the cops.

2. NEED FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION

The public recognizes this problem. The police recognize this problem. Our elected officials recognize this problem—and we are doing everything we can to solve it. This week, the cities of Stockton, Compton and Los Angeles enacted the toughest possible citywide bans on semi-automatic weapons. In Sacramento, Senator David Roberti and Assemblyman Mike Roos—with the help of Police Chief Daryl Gates and Sheriff Sherman Block—are pushing urgency legislation to extend the ban statewide.

Because we're so much under the gun, literally, I don't think any state is doing as much as California, but we are the first to recognize—we cannot do it alone. A California ban on the sale, possession and use of semi-automatic assault rifles will be of limited value, as long as those same guns can be purchased by mail or purchased just across the state line, in Reno or Flagstaff. California and other states desperately need the kind of umbrella protection against semi-automatic weapons that only federal legislation can provide.

3. ROLE OF THE MEDIA

We are counting on you, Senators. We are counting on our local and state elected officials. But we also know the tremendous political pressure you will feel from gunowners opposed to restrictions on semi-automatics.

Normally, this is a battle the media would stay out of—except to report the news. But this battle is too critical, too many innocent lives are on the line, for us in the media to remain silent. When the safety of our streets and cities is at stake, we can no longer be mere spectators. Freedom of the press implies responsibility of the press. And today, it is our responsibility—using all the powerful means we have at our disposal: talk shows; editorials; commentary; town forums; opinion pages—it is our responsibility both to inform the public of the dangers to society posed by military assault rifles and to help build support for getting rid of them. It is not fair, Mr. Chairman, for us to leave you out on the limb—alone. At KABC-TV and KABC Radio, we have tried to exercise our responsibility in several ways.

First, in editorials supporting a ban on semi-automatic weapons, like this editorial by KABC General Manager George Green. Second, in many hours of radio talk shows dedicated to exposing both sides of the issue and urging listeners to get involved. Third, and more directly, by our television public service feature called "Seven on Your Side": where reporter Henry Alfaro asked viewers to get busy, take a stand and write letters. We've received some 3,000 letters in one week. They run the range.

From the expected. John Adams of Huntington Beach writes: "I am against any kind of gun control." To the defiant: Michael O'Neill asserts: "I support the right of every American to own a semi-automatic weapon. These weapons in the hands of honest civilians serve as no threat to any other human."

To the unexpected. Ralph Beattie of Tarzana: "I am a life member of the NRA and the California Rifle and Pistol Association. Over the years, I have owned many rifles, pistols and shotguns, which I used while a licensed hunter and markmanship participant. But I am strongly against the availability of military attack weapons to the general public and see no purpose in them for a sportsman, hunter or marksman."

Granted, it is no scientific survey. But, as some indication of the public stands on this issue: those 3,000 letters are running two-to-one in support of banning military assault rifles. Fourth and finally, KABC TV and Radio have supported a ban on semi-automatic weapons in our commentary. With the cooperation of the Los Angeles Police Department, informing viewers every time an assault rifle is used in a crime. And, every day since the Stockton shooting three weeks ago, challenging viewers to provide one good reason for private ownership of an AK-47 or UZI. We've received hundreds of letters. And hundreds of reasons. Empty reasons you've heard before. Like: "I need it for hunting deer." Or: "The Second Amendment guarantees me the right to own any gun I want." Or: "I need it to protect my family." Lots of empty reasons. Not one good reason so far. Because there is no good reason. The only reason for owning an AK-47 is to kill people the owner doesn't like.

In conclusion. Thank you again, Mr. Chairman and Members, for this opportunity to testify on this all-important issue. We hope you will pick up where the cities of Los Angeles, Compton and Stockton let off—and make the ban on semi-automatic assault rifles nationwide. It is a goal so critical to the safety of our communities, that if we in the media fail to support you in your efforts, we will not be doing our job.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF JOHN M. SNYDER, PUBLIC AFFAIRS DIRECTOR, CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR THE RIGHT TO KEEP AND BEAR ARMS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee: Please accept my thanks for this opportunity to testify before this body on the matter of semi-automatic assault rifles.

With all of the public attention being given this subject subsequent to the horrendous January 17 slaying of five school children and the wounding of 27 others with the use of a semi-automatic rifle in Stockton, California by Patrick Edward Purdy, who also took his own life, I am most grateful to the Subcommittee for the chance publicly to offer my thoughtful reflections on this tragedy and on the subsequent reactions to it.

It would be well to recall at this juncture the August 1, 1966 incident in which Charles Joseph Whitman climbed the clock-tower which dominated the University of Texas campus at Austin and began a 96-minute terror spree in which he killed 16 people and wounded 20 more.

It would be well to recall that particular incident because in it Whitman did most of his mayhem with a bolt action Remington Model 700 in 6mm but finally was pinned down by police and armed citizens, including one firing an automatic rifle, a tripod-mounted M-14, thus limiting the mayhem Whitman was able to cause and making it possible for Austin police officer Ramiro Martinez to position himself for the final, savage encounter in which Martinez slew Whitman.

By recalling the 1966 Austin incident, we easily can see the beneficial use to which automatic rifles in the hands of law-abiding private citizens can be put. Unfortunately, though, we live in an era of apparent unreasoning reaction to irrational acts.

How else can one explain the senseless attack on the right of law-abiding American citizens to acquire and possess certain firearms, in this case semi-automatic rifles, when the Stockton incident calling forth this senseless attack indicates a breakdown in the criminal justice system's willingness or ability to protect citizens from criminals?

It almost appears that the spear carriers in this senseless attack effectively have been sucked into the cynical program developed by professional promoters of restrictive firearms legislation, one group of which, the Educational Fund to End Handgun Violence, stated in as recent pamphlet that the semi-automatic "weapons' menacing looks, coupled with the public's confusion over fully automatic machine guns versus semi-automatic assault weapons—anything that looks like a machine gun is assumed to be a machine gun—can only increase that chance of public support for restrictions on these weapons."

This latest attack on the right to keep and bear arms, carried out in legislative halls and in certain media, has even taken on a macabre and ghoulish quality, as manifest on a recent national weekly magazine cover depicting a surrealist skull superimposed on a distorted map of the "lower 48" United States hovering over crossed assault rifles. "Armed America," the cover proclaims, "More guns, more shootings, more massacres."

In the face of such a flagrant attack on the right to keep and bear arms, what are we to do?

We are, I hope, to keep cool and to approach this whole matter in so rational a manner as to bring about an actual improvement in the criminal justice system without chopping up the rights of the innocent gun owners throughout the United States who had nothing to do with the horrible slaying of the Stockton school children or with other horrible attacks on other innocent people.

Let us hope that this body does what it can as part of a general legislative initiative in a reform of the plea bargaining system at the Federal and State levels to strike at the heart of the real cause for the Stockton tragedy.

Not only does this initiative strike at the heart of the Stockton shooting and similar incidents, it also meshes with recently enacted legislation to curb criminal violence.

We call for a reform of the plea bargaining system which would require a person charged with a violent felony to bargain with the criminal justice system over sentencing but not over the charge.

Under this proposal, the violent criminal suspect would have to plead guilty to the felony charge unless it were dropped by prosecutors or he went to trial. Any bargaining in which the suspect and the legal system engaged would have to be over the length of the sentence, even probation, but someone who wanted simply to evade a felony record would not be able to do so.

Underlining this proposal is the fact that Patrick Edward Purdy, who shot the Stockton elementary school children, would have been prohibited from buying any kind of firearm under existing Federal and California law if he had not been allowed to plead down from a robbery charge in Woodland, California in 1984.

Purdy reportedly had a long criminal record and even had attempted suicide while in police custody but had no record of felony convictions. That is why he legally was able to elude the intent of Federal firearms laws when buying a semi-automatic rifle in Oregon and why he was able to purchase handguns in California despite that State's present 15-day waiting period and criminal record check.

At least two spokesmen for national police organizations support this proposal to reform the plea bargaining system rather than proposals to attack private semi-automatic rifle possession.

Deputy Sheriff Dennis Ray Martin of Saginaw County, Michigan, National President of the 103,000-member American Federation of Police, says "there's no sense having laws forbidding felons from acquiring firearms when we allow such dangerous felons to plead to misdemeanors and violations. We support this proposal to reform the plea bargaining system.

"Even if the felon gets probation, there are safeguards under firearms provisions of the Drug Act passed last year. Now if a probationer goes to buy a gun, he forfeits the probation and must serve his original sentence in jail."

The Executive Director of the National Association of Chiefs of Police, Gerald S. Arenberg, also supports this new plea reform proposal as a solution to the Stockton problem in preference to bans and new restrictions on semi-automatic firearms.

"When violent criminals who have been arrested by police are allowed to go free, or escape the consequences of their crimes, the legal system is failing in its duty to society," he says.

"The fault in the Purdy case—and in almost all of these sensational 'headline' cases—is that the culprits should have been in jail—and would have been in jail. The way to safeguard against such tragedies is not to ban the firearms of law-abiding people—but to see that people like Purdy don't get a chance to commit such horrible acts.

"Police long have supported the idea of reforming the plea-bargaining system."

There already are Federal and State laws prohibiting violent felons from acquiring firearms. Now, too, there is a new law regarding penalties for probationers who acquire or attempt to acquire firearms.

As of late last year, there exists a legislative requirement, a requirement which we supported, that the U.S. Department of Justice develop a system not only to provide a master file of such criminals but also to make it accessible to firearms dealers at the time of attempted firearms purchase.

The plea bargaining reform proposal, if enacted into law, will provide the missing piece of the legislative puzzle to insure that violent criminals like Purdy do not escape the net of justice.

This being the case, why not take this opportunity to demonstrate genuine statesmanship and enact it into law rather than infringe unnecessarily on the right of individual, law-abiding American citizens to keep and bear arms by banning semi-automatic firearms or restricting further law-abiding citizens' access to them?

Following here, for the convenience of Members of the Subcommittee, is the wording of model legislation implementing this proposal:

"The Congress recognizes the necessity of plea agreements in criminal proceedings, but also recognizes that plea agreements reducing felony charges to misdemeanors may have unanticipated effects that are detrimental to public safety. One such effect is that misdemeanor convictions do not restrict an individual's right to purchase various types of firearms. There have been persons who have been charged with several felonies that were reduced to misdemeanors by plea agreements, and the person's criminal history then contains no felony convictions. Such persons are then able to purchase certain firearms of types that would be prohibited to them had they been convicted of the original felony charges. It is the intent of the Congress to restrict the authority of prosecutors to reduce certain felony charges, while still permitting the recommendation of sentencing at the misdemeanor level.

"A prosecutor shall not reduce a felony charge to a misdemeanor when the facts of the case clearly indicate that the defendant committed the felony. In such case, the prosecutor may agree to recommend a sentence less than the standard sentence range for the felony by recommending a sentence at a misdemeanor range if the defendant enters a plea of guilty to the felony charge.

"A prosecutor who enters into a plea agreement that violates the preceding paragraph (section) is personally liable for damages resulting from any crime involving a firearm committed by a person who would not have been able to obtain the firearm had not a felony charge been reduced to less than a felony by a plea agreement entered into by that prosecutor."

As the 1966 Austin incident mentioned earlier in this statement indicates, automatic firearms, including automatic firearms, in the hands of law-abiding private citizens can be necessary in restoring the peace and assisting the law enforcement community in the maintenance of public order. In that incident, law-enforcement officers and civilians, including one man firing a tripod-mounted M-14, acted together in firing so as to rip off chunks of concrete from the protective wall around the observation deck where Whitman was located. This forced Whitman to keep low and fire through drainage slits, and made it possible for Officer Ramirez, with Whitman so occupied, to approach the Whitman position.

It should also be noted, in connection with the 1966 Austin incident, that two police officers, George McCoy and Jerry Day, along with armed private citizen Allen Crum, had worked their way up the tower to a position near Whitman's position. When Crum began firing so as to ricochet a volley of bullets off a corner of the tower so as to draw Whitman's attention to himself, the ploy worked and Whitman began firing in Crum's direction. This gave Martinez the opportunity to round the corner for his confrontation with the mass murderer.

Other incidents also serve to indicate the necessary cooperation between law enforcement officers and armed citizens which can develop in fighting crime. In Buffalo, New York, during the blizzard of 1977, public authorities called on truckers to arm themselves and to assist the police in their struggle against thieves, robbers, muggers and other violent criminals.

In that same year, during the Johnstown, Pennsylvania flood, the Mayor told the city's citizens that they had to be able to defend themselves against criminals since public safety officials were so heavily engaged in dealing with the situation created by the flood that they could not deal with much of the crime which might arise.

Without reference to such notable specific cases as these, one could note generally that semi-automatic firearms are kept by citizens for home protection and by farmers and ranchers for use against farm pests and wild animals.

In this age of international terrorism, when warnings come regularly to the public regarding the possible outbreak of terrorist attacks against American citizens within the United States, it would show a callous disregard not only for the rights of American citizens but also for our safety if Congress were to enact legislation making it difficult or impossible for law-abiding American citizens to obtain the semi-automatic firearms with which our lives and the lives and safety of our loved ones could be protected.

Terrorists will not be stopped by anti-gun laws from acquiring or using firearms against the innocent. Why pass laws to prevent the innocent from getting the firearms they may need to protect themselves from terrorists?

It's possible, too, that well-organized and well-armed bands of terrorists could seek to undermine the very stability of the United States government, as they already have done to so many other governments around the world. In such a situation, a well-armed law abiding citizenry, such as we now enjoy in the United States, could act to assist the government in thwarting such a move or series of moves. Why ban or restrict the arms with which the citizens could so assist the government?

While we certainly hope that no American Hitler or Stalin ever arises in the United States, we also should make sure that one of the factors which can prevent that from happening, that is a well-armed citizenry, never is eliminated or dissipated by unwise anti-gun legislation.

Right now, we're witnessing the international spectacle of the mighty Soviet Army turning tail and removing itself, retreating, if you will, from Afghanistan. This would not be happening if it were not for the fact that the Afghans are an armed citizenry, including with semi-automatic firearms and that they're not afraid to fight for their freedom.

How do you account for the fact that the mighty Soviet military machine, which has kept the disarmed citizenries of Eastern Europe and of many other parts of the world subjugated for so long has had its hat handed to it by the rag-tag Afghans if you do not take into serious account the armed nature of the Afghan population?

While we may not like to admit it, the same point could be made with regard to the Viet Namese who fought so successfully for so long with small arms, including semi-automatic firearms, against our own modern-equipped and armed military forces in Southeast Asia.

If the Polish people were well-armed today, do you think its freedom-loving spokesman would have to go toadying to the Communist government for even a modicum of the rights and freedoms we take for granted in this country with our armed citizenry?

Do you think Ethiopian genocide through deliberate massive starvation on the part of the government there ever would even have gotten off the ground had the Ethiopian citizenry been armed?

While some may scoff at these and similar citations, the fact of the matter is they are real and we should not overlook the obvious lesson to be gained from a consideration of them. An armed citizenry is an obstacle to tyranny and subjugation and a disarmed citizenry has been and may be an invitation to such tyranny and subjugation.

Given these considerations, Mr. Chairman and Members of this Subcommittee, why let public charlatans get away once again with a further perpetration of the snake oil of gun control on the American public.

There is ample general evidence to indicate that gun control is not the crime control panacea its promoters would have Congress and the public believe that it is.

For 75 years now, we've had the Sullivan Law in New York State on the books. For over 20 years, we've had the Federal Gun Control Act of 1968 on the books. For over 10 years, we've had the straight-jacketing District of Columbia anti-gun law on the books. Even in Canada, there's been a tough anti-gun law on the books for 10 years. At the time of each of these laws' enactment, the promoters of each one of them assured the public that each one of them would be effective in fighting crimes committed with firearms. Yet, the rates of crimes committed with firearms are higher now than they've ever been before this. Why? Obviously, gun control is not the answer.

For over 50 years now, fully-automatic rifles, machine guns, so thoroughly have been regulated that it has been impossible for private citizens to obtain one without a Federal permit. To the best of my knowledge, not one of these legally-acquired and possessed firearms has ever been used in the perpetration of a criminal act. Yet we know that machine guns have been used by criminals in the perpetration of criminal acts. What does this tell you about gun control laws but that law-abiding citizens abide by them but criminals do not?

The same can be said about sawed-off shotguns. Rigorously restricted for 50 years, they still are a favored weapon of criminals, especially bank robbers.

There you have it. Gun control has not worked, does not work and will not work in fighting crime.

Gun control impinges on the right and freedom of law-abiding American citizens.

We'd like the Subcommittee to consider it and act on it. Unlike the bogus crime-fighting proposals really directed against a large segment of the law-abiding citizenry, this is a genuine crime-fighting proposal. It's time for Congress to get off the backs of the tens of millions of law-abiding American firearms owners and to get on the case of violent criminals.

Thank you.

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, INSTITUTE FOR LEGISLATIVE ACTION, TESTIMONY ON SO-CALLED ASSAULT WEAPONS—ABSTRACT

The private purchase of new "assault rifles" has been banned since May 19, 1986. Technically, the correct definition of an assault rifle is a selective-fire military rifle. As such, they are fully-automatic firearms for the purposes of federal law.

The AKM-47 (actually a Model 56S, a copy of the AKM-47) used by Patrick Purdy in his heinous crime in Stockton, California on January 17th is a semi-automatic rifle functionally identical to millions of semi-automatic rifles owned by hunters and sportsmen in the United States for nearly a century. It was not converted to fully-automatic fire, nor is it "readily convertible." That semi-automatic rifle is no more "powerful" or more "rapid-fire" than any other semi-automatic hunting and target rifle owned by millions of Americans.

Among the more popular semi-automatic firearms currently owned by Americans are: the Ruger .44 Magnum Carbine, the Remington Model Four in .30-'06, the Heckler & Koch 770 in .308, the Browning BAR .30-'06, the Remington Model 1100 shotgun, the Ruger Mini-14 .223, the Colt AR-15 .223, and the Springfield Armory M1A .308. The Remington Model 1100 alone has sold more than 3 million copies in the U.S., the M1 Carbine some 5 million since World War II.

The NRA will oppose any attempts to ban or restrict semi-automatic target and hunting firearms some choose erroneously to call "assault weapons." In previous debates, the NRA worked with members of Congress and the Administration to craft meaningful definitions and meaningful legislation to address concerns that were shared by sportsmen and "gun control" advocates. This attack on semi-automatic firearms, however, is an attack on an entire class of firearms that have been owned by millions of law-abiding Americans throughout this century.

What was once an attack on handguns, this year is an attack on rifles and shotguns.

Legislation like H.R. 669 and Senator Metzenbaum's proposal attempt to redefine the term "assault weapon." It is not possible to define "assault" firearms based on their ability to "accept" large capacity magazines, as these proposals do. Any firearm capable of "accepting" a box-type magazine is capable of "accepting" magazines of indeterminate capacity. Thus, for these proposed definitions to mean anything, they must mean the prohibition of virtually all semi-automatic rifles and pistols, and all tubular magazine shotguns as well.

The real lesson to be drawn from the Purdy crime is that Purdy was a criminal who ought to have been in jail rather than left free to roam the streets. Purdy had been arrested for the crimes of drug possession, solicitation of sex, illegal possession of dangerous weapons, receipt of stolen property, attempted robbery, criminal conspiracy, firing a pistol in a national forest, and resisting arrest. His plea bargains on some of those charges resulted in misdemeanor convictions only, not the felonies with which he was charged. Purdy's last contact with the criminal justice system resulted in a probation report that described him as a danger to himself and others.

Purdy's lack of a felony record meant he could and did comply with and pass the 15-day waiting period and police background check required under California law to purchase five pistols. It was the criminal justice system that failed those schoolchildren in the tragic incident in Stockton, California.

The NRA today proposes a series of crime-fighting initiatives. The NRA will support these initiatives with the same vigor with which we oppose restrictive firearms laws.

First, we propose the assignment of at least one Assistant U.S. Attorney in each district to prosecute felon-in-possession cases under 18 U.S.C. 922(g).

Second, we propose a five-year freeze on plea bargain agreements when individuals are charged with violent or drug trafficking crimes.

Third, we call for increased enforcement of the provisions of Public Law 99-308, the Firearms Owners' Protection Act. That law made it a federal felony, to be punished with mandatory penalties, to use a firearm while committing a drug-trafficking offense. If the Justice Department finds that firearms were acquired from out-of-state in an investigation of gun-running rings, the federal government should step in.

Fourth, we support the conversion to prisons of military bases scheduled to be closed, as well as reasonable funding mechanisms earmarked solely for the construction of Level III prison facilities.

Fifth, we support the establishment of a special, expedited death penalty for those who kill police officers in the course of committing a felony.

Sixth, we look forward to working with members of the Congress and the Administration to ensure that Section 6213 of Public Law 100-690 is carried out: That the Attorney General report to Congress this fall with a program allowing for the accurate and instantaneous screening of firearms purchasers at the point of purchase.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES JAY BAKER, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL AFFAIRS, NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION, INSTITUTE FOR LEGISLATIVE ACTION ON SEMI-AUTOMATIC FIREARMS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, on behalf of the National Rifle Association of America, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you representing law-abiding gun owners. I ask that my entire testimony, as well as it attachments, be included in the record of these proceedings.

We received Senator Metzenbaum's S. 386 yesterday, and will not give a detailed analysis of it at this time. Instead, I will confine my remarks to a general critique of H.R. 669 and S. 386, as well as the issues of semi-automatic firearms, "gun control," and violent crime.

Let me say at the outset that the private purchase of new "assault rifles" has already been banned and has been since May 19, 1986. Assault rifles are included under the requirements of the National Firearms Act of 1934. Technically, the correct and only definition of an assault rifle is a selective-fire military rifle. As such, they are fully-automatic firearms, or machine guns and submachineguns, for the purposes of federal law. The rifle used by Patrick Purdy in his heinous crime is not an "assault" rifle, as has been so widely reported in the media. The AKM-47 (actually a Model 56S, a copy of the AKM-47) used by Purdy is a semi-automatic rifle functionally identical to millions of semi-automatic rifles owned by law-abiding Americans across the country, no more and no less. Semi-automatic firearms have been legally possessed in this country for almost one hundred years.

Millions of hunters and sportsmen own and use semi-automatic rifles and shotguns, and have for decades. Among the more popular current models for sporting use: the Ruger .44 Magnum Carbine, the Remington Model Four in .30-'06, Heckler & Kick 770 in .308, the Browning BAR .30-'06, the Remington Model 1100 shotgun, the Ruger Mini-14 .223, the Colt AR-15 .223, and the Springfield Armory M1A .308. the Remington Model 1100 alone has sold more than 3 million copies in the United States, the M1 Carbine some 5 million since World War II.

Military model semi-automatic rifles and carbines have been sold to the general public for decades. Millions of M1 Garands, M1 Carbines, M1As (the civilian semi-automatic model of the Army's M-14 rifle), and AR-15s have been sold to private citizens over the last 40 years. These are all military model semi-automatics and are used in countless high-power target matches every year including the national matches at Camp Perry, Ohio. They are purchased by hunters, target shooters, and collectors.

In short, Mr. Chairman, the National Rifle Association will not assist or cooperate with anyone in banning or restricting semi-automatic target and hunting firearms some choose to erroneously call "assault weapons." You will remember previous debates in which the NRA worked with members of Congress and the Administration to craft meaningful legislation to address concerns that were shared by sportsmen and other groups concerned with public safety issues.

On the armor-piercing ammunition issue, as you know, the NRA first opposed legislation that would have banned hunting and target ammunition because of overly broad definitions. We worked with members of Congress and the Administration to develop language that precisely defined the issue at hand, met police concerns, and protected the nation's law-abiding firearms owners.

On the so-called "plastic gun" issue, as you also know, the NRA opposed legislation that would have banned fully-detectable firearms because of yet another faulty definitional standard. We again worked with members of Congress and the Administration to develop language that precisely defined the issue, and again helped to produce workable legislative language that passed both bodies of Congress nearly unanimously.

The attack on semi-automatic firearms is no less than an attack on an entire class of firearms that have been owned by millions of law-abiding Americans throughout this century. In a sense, the NRA's historic position on gun control at times characterized as paranoia by our opponents, has been vindicated. Advocates of gun control have finally admitted that they are not interested in protecting the rights of law-abiding gun owners—they are merely interested in eliminating any type of firearm whenever presented with an emotionally charged opportunity to do so. What was once an attack on handguns is this year an attack on rifles and shotguns.

CRITIQUE OF PROPOSALS ON SEMI-AUTOMATIC FIREARMS

Sportsmen have been told for years that the reason gun control advocates targeted handguns was because they were not suitable for militia use, hunting, or self-protection and were therefore not included under the constitutional safeguard of the Second Amendment. We are now being told by anti-gun advocates and certain politicians that precisely because many semi-automatic firearms useful for hunting and target shooting are patterned after their military counterparts, they should be banned or heavily restricted in the interest of public safety.

Today we are talking about the outright banning of an entire class of firearms that have been legally owned in this country for a century. In fact, legislative proposals in both bodies of Congress call for imposing federal felony prosecutions on law-abiding citizens that do not surrender or register their lawfully purchased firearms. It is just this type of ill-considered legislation that the Second Amendment is designed to protect against. And it is worth remembering that American citizens' constitutionally protected right to "keep and bear arms" puts the burden of proof on those whose first instinct is always to abridge that right.

One can imagine how defenders of the First Amendment would react if every time somone made a slanderous statement legislators were urged to restrict freedom of speech. The safeguards built into the Bill of Rights are not to be compromised or legislated away lightly—especially not simply as a reaction to the actions of a homicidal maniac who slipped through the cracks of a crack-ridden criminal justice system, and especially when those impacted are only law-abiding citizens. There is no rational reason to legislate against the inalienable rights of law-abiding individuals simply because some individuals abuse those same rights. Instead we should arrest, prosecute, sentence, and imprison the latter in a ongoing effort to protect the former.

Recognizing that many do not share our belief in those principles, I turn now to the specifics of proposals we have seen. Most bills introduced to date on the issue of semi-automatic firearms fail to distinguish between types of firearms in the manner of early drafts on the armor-piercing ammo and "plastic gun" issues. Unlike those issues, there is no middle ground between banning or restricting some semi-automatics on the one hand, and all semi-automatics on the other. The reason for that is simple: There is no functional difference between semi-automatic firearms of the type traditionally used in hunting or other recreational activities, and those which are patterned after military firearms of the modern age. That is why both an AKM-47 and a "traditional" Remington or Browning semi-automatic can be cerfitied as having a sporting purpose on the one hand, and not "readily convertible," on the other.

Some proposals, H.R. 669 and S. 386, attempt to redefine the term "assault weapon." In doing so, those bills encompass millions of semi-automatic firearms commonly used for hunting, target shooting, and self-protection. It is not possible to define "assault" firearms based on their ability to "accept" large capacity magazines. Any firearm employing a box-type magazine is capable of "accepting" magazines of an indeterminate capacity. Even shotguns with integral tubular magazines are capable of accepting magazines of larger capacities. Thus, for these proposed definitions to mean anything, they must mean the prohibition of virtually all rifles and pistols, and all tubular magazine shotguns as well.

S. 386 implicitly recognizes this definitional problem by failing to provide a definition at all. Section 3 of S. 386 defines "assault weapons" as those firearms designated in the bill, "versions" of those firearms, and firearms that are "substantially identical" to those firearms. The term "substantially identical" is nowhere defined in the legislation. As we have heard from the Treasury Department today, there is no functional difference between semi-automatic firearms, whether on the list provided in Section 3 or not. To my mind, the term "substantially identical" is equivalent to without functional difference. Thus, the logic of Section 3 is circular: An "assualt weapon" is a firearm so designated, based on its similarity to "assault weapons" so designated. It would have been much clearer, Mr. Chairman, for S. 386 to define an "assault weapon" as any semi-automatic firearm, period. That is certainly the effect of the so-called definition.

After failing to provide a definition, S. 386 hands off the entire issue of definition—in many ways the essence of legislation—to the Treasury Department. Although it is difficult to conceive of a semi-automatic firearm not already covered in Section 3, that Section also provides that "all other semi-automatic firearms" can be designated as "assault weapons" at the discretion of the Treasury Secretary. These unnamed and undefined firearms would then be banned, and failure to register them would be a federal felony carrying a 10-year, $10,000 fine.

S. 386 would also place currently owned semi-automatic firearms under the highly restrictive requirements of the 1934 National Firearms Act. If virtually all semi-automatic firearms are included—as they appear to be—untold millions of the nation's 65 million firearms owners will annually be subjected to a system that processed less than 100,000 individuals over a 52-year span. Conservative estimates indicate more than 20 million firearms currently possessed would be included under many of the proposed definitions. These Title II restrictions are a wish list for gun control advocates. They include a lengthy federal background check, registration, restrictions on transportation, fingerprinting, and a sign-off by local law enforcement. Yet these restrictions have not affected those drug traffickers using illegally acquired machine guns or illegally acquired and illegally converted semi-automatics to further their crimes. These criminals circumvent the system completely, and, by definition, always will. Needless to say, millions of hunters, competitive shooters, protective owners, and collectors should not be subjected to a system that has had absolutely no impact on machine gun use in violent drug trafficking crime. Millions of law-abiding gun owners and sportsmen will not sit idly by in contemplation of the several month procedure contained in the 1934 National Firearms Act. Further, there is no good reason relative to curtailing firearms abuse to subject law-abiding sportsmen who have owned semi-automatic firearms for decades to a system requiring them to submit federal registration forms to the Treasury Department and the F.B.I., and then ask for a sign-off from local law enforcement prior to buying the type of firearm their fathers taught them to hunt with.

The registration provisions of S. 386 point up the misguided nature of all "gun control" proposals. Section 6 requires the owner of a lawfully purchased firearm to locate a copy of the Federal Register listing prohibited semi-automatics. If his or her firearm is on that list, the owner must register it with the federal government within a month or face a 10-year prison sentence and a $10,000 fine. On the other hand, if a drug trafficker actually uses a firearm on the list in a violent crime, he faces only a 5-year penalty. Given the current failure to prosecute even felons in possession of firearms, it is unconscionable to threaten law-abiding citizens with a federal felony due to their possession of a lawfully purchased semi-automatic firearm that may later be found to be "substantially identical" to semi-automatic firearms on a list held by the Treasury Department.

At best, S. 386 contemplates a form of super-waiting period, federal registration, and government background investigation in order to legitimize the ownership of a previously purchased, and previously lawful, semi-automatic firearm. In light of the rejection of that system in the 100th Congress, when the defeated proposal encompassed a seven-day, not a several-month, wait prior to the purchase of only pistols or revolvers it seems counterproductive to revisit that issue. I refer you to my testimony before this Subcommittee on June 16, 1987. The most troubling aspect of new proposals on this issue is that sportsmen were told last session that they should accept waiting period proposals because they would never extend to their rifles or shotguns. Mr. Chairman, this goes beyond the old adage: "give them an inch and they'll take a mile." The Congress refused last year to give that inch, yet some now expect them to give up that mile.

The National Rifle Association and untold millions of hunters, target shooters, and protective gun owners are prepared to fight every step of the way on this issue until this Congress begins to address serious problems—recognized by all in this room regardless of their position on so-called "assault rifles"—inherent in an abysmally inadequate criminal justice system.

LESSONS OF THE PURDY CRIME LOST

As Senator Metzenbaum indicated in his letter to me, Mr. Chairman, the impetus for this hearing was the tragic crime committed by Patrick Edward Purdy on January 17th in Stockton, California. Notwithstanding the dangers of legislating on the basis of cover stories and headlines, the facts surrounding the true causes of that tragic crime have largely been ignored.

The semi-automatic rifle used by Purdy was not converted to fully-automatic fire, nor is it readily convertible, as has been reported by many. That rifle and semi-automatic firearms generally are used lawfully for hunting in some 48 states, and can be seen in the hands of target shooters at nearly every rifle range in the country. The very reason this rifle can be imported into this country—its "sporting purpose"—refutes the claim of those who call it a "weapon of war." And finally, perhaps to the surprise of some, there is absolutely nothing new about the mechanical function of that particular semi-automatic rifle. It employs a re-loading principle, the semi-automatic action, that has been employed in both military and sporting rifles for most of the century. It is not more "powerful" or more "rapid-fire"—other misconceptions widely reported—than any other semi-automatic hunting or target rifle owned by millions of Americans.

In short, the only thing new about this rifle is the misapplication of the label "assault" by people who are trying to ban it. We are hearing that these rifles are the "weapon of choice" for criminals loose on the streets. Just last year, Mr. Chairman, this Congress was asked to consider a national waiting period and background check for pistols and revolvers because they were called the "weapons of choice" for those same criminals. Just this week, Lt. James Moran, the commander of the Ballistics Unit for the New York City Police Department set the record straight in the New York Times: "A rifle is not what usually is used by the criminals. They'll have handguns or sawed-off shotguns. You have more firepower with a 9-millimeter handgun than you do with an AK-47. * * * The rifle is big. * * * These drug dealers are more inclined to use the 9-millimeter pistol than go to a cumbersome AK-47 rifle." Thus, it is clear to the NRA that most who propose restrictive gun control are not focusing on criminals and their guns, they only care about banning and or restricting firearms, period.

The real lesson to be drawn from the Purdy crime is that Patrick Edward Purdy was a criminal who ought to have been in jail rather than left free to roam the streets. Purdy had a seven-year history of involvement with the California criminal justice system. He had been arrested for the crimes of drug possession, solicitation of sex, illegal possession of dangerous weapons, receipt of stolen property, attempted robbery, criminal conspiracy, firing a pistol in a national forest, and resisting arrest. His plea bargains on some of these charges resulted in misdemeanor convictions only, not the felonies with which he was charged and should have been prosecuted. His last contact with the criminal justice system resulted in probation, even though his own probation report described him as a danger to himself and others. Because of this failure of the criminal justice system, Purdy's lack of a felony record meant he could and did comply with and pass the 15-day waiting period and police background check required under California law to purchase five pistols. It was the criminal justice system that failed those five schoolchildren, and resulted in the tragic incident in Stockton, California.

In fact, the California probation system was the subject of an extensive study published in 1985 by the Rand Corporation and the National Institute of Justice. The National Institute of Justice concluded that felony probation "does present a serious threat to public safety." The Rand Corporation studied data on more than 16,000 felons, and recidivism data on a subsample of 1,672 who received probation in Los Angeles and Alameda Counties. The study found that:

65% of the total sample were rearrested;

53% had official charges filed against them;

75% of those charges involved burglary, theft, robbery, or other violent crimes;

51% were reconvicted;

18% were convicted of homicide, rape, assault, robbery, or weapons offenses;

34% were sent back to jail or prison.

Clearly, decisions regarding probation are being driven by concerns over prison overcrowding and not by determinations that certain individuals do not pose a risk to society.

As we meet here today, the combined failure of gun control and the criminal justice system is all around us. As you know, the District of Columbia has the most restrictive gun control laws in the nation. Handguns are banned, and even a bill similar to H.R. 669, Congressman Berman's semi-automatic ban bill, is in force. Yet violent crime is rampant in the city at levels far exceeding those experienced before the imposition of the D.C. gun ban. One reason for that may be found in the treatment of the two individuals who shot those youths at Wilson High School recently. They were charged with four counts and one count of assault with intent to kill, respectively. The first paid $2,250 to get out of jail on a surety bond. The second paid only $450. But we can take solace in the fact that they were ordered to obey a curfew. It's no wonder a teacher at another D.C. school was reported as saying: "What would they have had to have done to be denied bail * * * wipe out the whole school?"

Instead of improving the criminal justice system, gun control advocates are exploring new ways to disarm or restrict the law-abiding. As we meet here, the City Council is considering legislation to make handgun manufacturers strictly liable for the criminal misuse of their products—despite the fact that handgun manufacturers are already virtually prohibited from selling their products in the District, and have been since 1976; and despite the fact that such a legal theory has been discredited in every state of the nation. The intention of the D.C. City Council and the gun control advocates generally in pushing this legislation is clear: export the District's failed gun ban by making firearms manufacturers uninsurable.

Yet across the United States, the private ownership of firearms by the law-abiding is a valid and valuable response to failures of the criminal justice system. Criminologists report that private firearms ownership is both a general and specific deterrent to violent crime and violent criminals. One independent study estimates that one million Americans use rifles, shotguns, and pistols, each year for self-protection.

NRA'S CRIME-FIGHTING PROPOSAL

Today we are hearing the same tired proposals that sportsmen and gun owners have been hearing since the early 1900s. In the face of violent crime currently linked to massive drug smuggling and its financial profits, elected representatives in Congress and state legislatures call for making felons out of law-abiding citizens who insist on their right to own firearms. At the same time, the criminal justice system is apparently unable or unwilling to prosecute and jail the real felons. The NRA asks you to explore and consider every possible means of restricting criminals and improving the criminal justice system before legislating any restrictions that will only impact the law-abiding citizen, and may well aid the criminal.

Law-abiding Americans believe that criminals who violate existing laws should suffer the penalties. But the fact is, violators are not suffering those penalties. Criminal justice failures were widely reported earlier this week. USA Today called it "Getting Off Easy." That's an accurate phrase when the average drug trafficker received a sentence of only six years—and then actually served less than two years. The Wall Street Journal reported that less than half the people convicted of felonies nationwide went to prison. And that doesn't begin to address the real issue, since an indeterminable number of people charged with penalties plea bargain down to obtain only a misdemeanor conviction.

Therefore, we propose today a series of crime-fighting initiatives. We pledge to you today that we will support these initiatives with the same vigor with which we oppose restrictive firearms laws. These proposals can be supported by sportsmen, law enforcement, and any gun control advocates who really care about fighting crime.

First, we propose the assignment of at least one Assistant U.S. Attorney in each district to prosecute felon-in-possession cases under 18 U.S.C. 922(g). Increased funding for U.S. Attorneys was a feature of the omnibus Anti-Drug Abuse Act, and we support that funding.

Second, we propose a five-year freeze on plea bargain agreements when individuals are charged with violent or drug trafficking crimes. The Purdy crime alone demonstrates the result of a plea bargain policy that has become all too common in the face of overcrowded court dockets and prison systems.

Third, we call for increased enforcement of the provisions of the Firearms Owners' Protection Act, Public Law 99-308. As you know, the law made it a federal felony, to be punished with mandatory penalties, to use a firearm while committing a drug-trafficking offense. Last year, Congress increased those penalties in the omnibus "Anti-Drug Abuse Act." Any reluctance by the government to prosecute federal gun-law violators who have been arrested and charged with local offenses, but who are also violating federal laws against possession by felons, particularly of Title II weapons such as sawed-off shotguns or unregistered machine guns, must be addressed. If the Justice Department finds that firearms were acquired from out of state in an investigation of gun-running rings, the federal government should step in. This would assist local government in a number of ways. First, it would make real the largely rhetorical federal assistance in the "State Firearms Control Assistance Act" which is the first title of the 1968 Gun Control Act. Second, it would mean tougher jail sentences than may occur with merely local prosecution. And third, it would help with the problem of expensive and overcrowded state prisons by diverting the most serious of drug-trafficking offenders to the federal system.

Fourth, we support two measures aimed at increasing the nation's prison space. Initially, the federal government should look to those military bases which are scheduled for closure. With minimal expense, these bases could be converted to prisons for use by the federal government or by the states in which they are located. As a second step, the NRA is prepared to support reasonable funding mechanisms earmarked solely for the construction of Level III prison facilities to house the most violent criminal offenders.

Fifth, we support the establishment of a special, expedited death penalty for those who kill police officers in the course of committing a felony or who kill police officers' family members in retribution for the performance of their duties.

Sixth, we look forward to working with members of Congress and the Administration to ensure that the mandate of the McCollum substitute to the so-called "Brady Amendment" is carried out: That the Attorney General report to Congress this fall with a program that will allow for the accurate and instantaneous screening of firearms purchasers at the point of purchase.

We are confident that broad support for these proposals can be garnered from most of the groups represented in this room today. We are also confident that reasonable individuals will agree that these proposals hold far greater promise for reducing the nation's appalling level of violent crime than does any ill-conceived and misdirected gun control proposal. Thank you.

TESTIMONY OF NEAL KNOX, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, THE FIREARMS COALITION CONCERNING ASSAULT RIFLES

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. I appreciate this opportunity to testify on behalf of the Firearms Coalition and the million readers of my regular columns in Shotgun News, Handloader, Rifle and Guns & Ammo magazines.

The effort to ban so-called "assault rifles" represents a public admission by the advocates of "gun control" that their objective is not just to regulate or ban handguns, as they have claimed, but rifles and shotguns as well. The definitions used in state and federal bills now being considered would not only ban the military-type firearms being waved before the cameras, but some of the most popular rifles and shotguns designed and used for hunting, trap and skeet, and other forms of recreation.

The arguments used to support these bills are evidence of the predicted switch of criminal misusers of firearms from relatively low-powered handguns to far more lethal shotguns and rifles—a switch exacerbated by the wrong-headed efforts to ban production and sale of handguns, instead of focussing upon criminal acts.

As recently as 1986, James D. Wright of the University of Massachusetts—once a staunch advocate of interdictive gun laws—stated in "The Armed Criminal in America," research done for the Justice Department: "certain commonly proposed gun-banning measures could have strongly undesirable consequences, resulting in the substitution of more powerful and more lethal arms."

Granted, Wright was speaking of criminal misuse, not insane acts such as the murders of five children on a Stockton, CA schoolyard. But no matter what restrictions may be placed upon sane and law-abiding citizens, there is no way to prevent such tragedies. If Patrick Purdy had not owned an AK semi-automatic rifle, those children obviously would not have been shot with a 7.62x39; but they could have been shot with the 15-shot Taurus 9mm pistol Purdy also carried on that schoolyard. Or even more of the 400 children crowded on that schoolyard could have died and been injured if he had driven his car across it, or thrown his "Molotov cocktails."

It should be underscored that Purdy was the very type of individual who supposedly would have been prevented from obtaining a firearm under a waiting period/police background check such as this committee considered last fall. He had a lengthy record of arrest and convictions, including drug violations and illegal manufacture of a machine gun; a police psychiatrist had found him a danger to himself and the public; he was reportedly drawing $682 monthly from the Social Security Administration as mentally disabled. Yet five times he obtained handguns after undergoing California's touted 15-day waiting period/background investigation, most recently obtaining the Taurus 9mm with which he killed himself the next school day after he obtained it.

No legislation specifically defining "assault rifle" is before this committee, but all of the state bills I have seen, as well as H.R. 669 by Rep. Howard Berman in the House, include variations of a definition used by California Attorney General John Van de Kamp in a mailing to law enforcement officials Dec. 5, 1988. That letter states the Attorney General's intent to draft legislation banning private possession of "assault rifles," and requested statistics to justify such a ban. His definition of "assault rifle" includes more than half of all long guns made in this country, for it includes most common .22 rimfire autoloading rifles, many semi-automatic centerfire hunting rifles, and all shotguns—of any action type—with five-shot capacity, which includes the most-popular shotguns made.

The Attorney General's definition of "assault rifle" even includes the 5-shot Remington Model 1100 shotgun, which Handgun Control Inc. co-chairman Nelson Shields once told me he owns for waterfowl hunting. When such effects are pointed out, it is claimed that they are mere "drafting errors," and that the sponsors never intended to include common guns. Frankly, I find such statements difficult to believe, in light of the considerable firearms expertise demonstrated elsewhere.

As an example, the definition of "assault rifle" used in last summer's proposed Senate amendment to the drug bill reportedly was "any shotgun or semi-automatic rifle patterned after a military firearm." The majority of U.S.-made repeating shotguns would be included in that definition, for all the most-popular commercial shotguns have been used by U.S. forces in combat in World Wars I or II, Korea or Vietnam.

I have stressed the problem of definition for the simple fact that it is impossible to make a meaningful distinction between hunting guns, self-defense guns and military small arms.

Magazine capacity is not a meaningful distinction, for in forms of pistol competition which include reloading, it requires only about 1.5 seconds to change magazines. It is illusory to think that a gun is "more dangerous" with one 30-shot magazine than with two 15-shot magazines, or three 10-shot magazines.

Action type isn't a meaningful distinction, for the Model 12 "pump" Winchester shotgun can be fired slightly more quickly than a Remington Model 1100 autoloader. In less than three seconds the common 12 gauge Model 12 can fire six 00 buckshot loads, each charged with 12 .33 caliber balls—72 bullets in three seconds, each ball capable of a fatal or disabling wound a city block away. The Model 1100 can discharge 60 .33 caliber bullets in about 2½ seconds, which is more firepower than any conventional machine gun.

It is my opinion as a court-qualified "firearms expert" that either the six-shot Model 12 or the five Shot Model 1100 Remington 12 gauge hunting shotguns are more lethal at ranges under 50 yards than either the semi or full-automatic versions of the AK-47 with 7.62x39 military ammunition.

Because so many hunting and competition guns would be banned by Van de Kamp's definition, major changes were made in the California Senate bill by David Roberti, and in almost identically worded definitions in bills introduced in Maryland and the U.S. House (H.R. 669). Each of those bills makes such modifications as their sponsors felt were necessary to make their bills politically palatable, while retaining their goal of banning as many long guns as possible.

One amendment increased the acceptable maximum capacity of unrestricted shotguns by one round to five rounds total, which would make most tubular magazine shotguns legal, but still leaves the popular six-shot Model 12 Winchester/Browning trap, skeet and hunting shotgun branded as an "assault rifle."

Another amendment broadened the semi-auto rifle definition to "Any semi-automatic that accepts a detachable magizine with a capacity of 20 or more rounds of ammunition" H.R. 669 uses that language but exempts popular .22 rimfire autoloading rifles. The Maryland bill makes it apply to rimfire rifles and all semi-automatic handguns. Every box-magazine rifle or handgun is capable of accepting 20 or even 50-shot magazines, and such easily made magazines are presently available for most guns.

Mr. Chairman, as this testimony was being prepared, a member of Mr. Metzenbaum's staff informed me that the "capable of accepting a 20-round magazine" definition is being considered in draft legislation. However, I was told the bill would initially ban certain specific makes and models, then abdicate the definitional problem to the Treasury and Justice Departments, which would in effect be responsible for both writing and enforcing the law.

That is reminiscent of the method used for avoiding Congressional responsibility on other difficult issues, such as dealing with budget deficits and setting Congressional pay scales. Without regard to the merits of the issue, I object to that method of legislating.

While I have emphasized the huge number of guns used for hunting which would be banned by so-called "assault rifle" legislation, hunting is not the issue, nor is whether I "need" a particular type firearm for hunting. I resent anyone telling me what I "need" just as much as I resent anyone telling me what I may read; I am a law-abiding citizen who resents being treated as a criminal because I own and lawfully use firearms.

To me, and those I represent, guns are mechanically interesting, historically interesting and aesthetically interesting. But they are much more than that. In his Commentaries on the Constitution Supreme Court Justice Story wrote: "The right of the citizen to keep and bear arms has justly been considered as the palladium [—the guardian—] of the liberties of a republic; since it offers a strong moral check against the usurpation and arbitrary power of rulers."

In Federalist Paper No. 46, James Madison wrote derisively of the governments of Europe which "are afraid to trust their peoples with arms." Madison would be appalled that this Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution is considering legislation which is so obviously a violation of the Constitution.

In U.S. v. Miller (1939), the only Second Amendment decision in this century, the Supreme Court upheld a portion of the National Firearms Act's restrictions on the narrow ground that because no evidence had been presented that short-barreled shotguns have "some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well-regulated militia, we cannot say that the Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear such an instrument. Certainly it is not within judicial notice that this weapon is any part of the ordinary military equipment or that its use could contribute to the common defense."

If both sides had been heard in that case—instead of only the agency which proposed the law—evidence surely would have been presented that short-barrelled shotguns are and always have been part of U.S. military equipment. However, there can be no question that military-type rifles are military arms, and therefor included under the prohibitions upon the Congress guaranteed by the Second Amendment.

Even if the Second Amendment applied only to militia members, by law virtually everyone in this room is a member of the militia. Only four months after the Constitution was ratified, the Militia Act of 1792 established two classes of militia: (a) those formally organized into militia units and (b) all other able-bodied men aged 18 to 45. The National Guard Act of 1903 specifically did not replace that militia but added a third class of Federally controlled militia (See Sec. 311, Title 10 U.S.C.).

In 1876, the Supreme Court, in U.S. v. Cruikshank recognized possession of arms as a fundamental right, stating "the bearing of arms for a lawful purpose is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon the instrument for its existence." Accordingly, since none of the Bill of Rights had then been interpreted as limitations on other than the Congress, the Cruikshank court ruled that the First and Second Amendments limited the national government, but did not prohibit the Ku Klux Klan from preventing freed black slaves from holding political meetings or having guns. It is most unlikely that the Supreme Court would reach such a decision today.

In 1960 Justice Hugo Black, in "The Bill of Rights" (35 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 865, 873), wrote that the Second Amendment is an "absolute" prohibition against infringement by Congress. The reason, as made clear by the writings of the Constitutional framers, was that the right of the people to keep and bear arms was intended as an insurance policy guaranteeing governmental adherence to the First Amendment and the rest of the Bill of Rights.

Some claim that the Second Amendment was intended to apply only to organized militia, rather than as an individual right. But an effort to limit the Second Amendment by adding "for the common defense" was attempted when it was debated in the Senate of the First Congress. That amendment was soundly defeated, but revisionists act as if it had passed. (Journal of the First Session of the Senate of the United States, p. 20 (1820).)

Time Magazine recently stated that "surely" military-type rifles were what the Constitutional Framers intended to protect from governmental infringement. On the contrary, as Dr. Joseph Olson, Professor of Law at Hamline University School of Law said while reviewing this testimony, military-type firearms "are precisely the type of weapon which the Second Amendment is designed to keep in the hands of the individual citizen."

The Second Amendment has nothing to do with hunting, target shooting, gun collecting or any other recreational use of firearms. The Second Amendment does, however, protect every citizens' right to protect himself, his family and this nation. The beauty of this "freedom insurance" plan is that so long as the right exists, it is never needed.

In the passions of the moment, aroused by the terrible tragedy on that Stockton, California schoolyard, it may be difficult to think of the overriding necessity to protect civil liberties, but protection of our civil rights—every one of them guaranteed by the armed populace that Thomas Jefferson intended—is the real issue in this debate.

I urge the members of this committee, and of this Senate, to carefully consider what is at stake. Thank you for this opportunity to present our views.●

CONDEMNATION OF CERTAIN ACTS BY IRAN—SENATE RESOLUTION 68

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, last week my friend and distinguished colleague Senator MOYNIHAN submitted a resolution condemning the Ayatollah Khomeini's death threat against the British author Salman Rushdie and bomb threats against the American publisher Viking Press. I associate myself with Senator MOYNIHAN's eloquent words and will ask to be made a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 68.

I speak today not only as a Senator, but as an author and publisher. The first amendment is the cornerstone of our democracy. It is true that our Constitution does not bind foreign leaders. But the values of freedom of speech and thought, and the freedom to write and publish, are also part of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The right to criticize is the most basic right of all. Without it, there can be no true freedom.

Ours is a pluralistic world, and we must understand there are cultures different from our own. But it is totally unacceptable for the leader of one nation to order the assassination of a citizen of another nation. It is totally unacceptable for the ayatollah to place a bounty on Mr. Rushdie's head for any reason, but it is especially troubling that this death threat has been made because of what Mr. Rushdie's has written. I understand the emotion behind those who are offended by Mr. Rushdie's book, but death threats and bomb threats have no place in today's world. Book banning and book burnings are sad spectables wherever they occur, and should not go unchallenged. Calling for the death of an author in a foreign country must be met by a strong diplomatic response.

I applaud President Bush's words of condemnation, and the European Community member states' decision to withdraw their envoys from Iran. These words and actions demonstrate that we will fight against religious intolerance and bigotry. Any attempt to suppress freedom of speech and thought, or the right to freely publish books, must be roundly condemned. The Senate ought to speak loud and clear in this area.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. ABEL WOLMAN

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the death of Dr. Abel Wolman marks the passing of one of our Nation's finest environmental engineers and a distinguished public servant. He served as chief sanitary engineer for the Maryland State Health Department and as head of the sanitary engineering and public health schools and professor emeritus of Johns Hopkins University.

Dr. Abel Wolman has been universally recognized for his significant contributions to the advancement of sanitation and health throughout the world. In 1918, Dr. Wolman, along with chemist Linn Enslow, developed the standard chlorine treatment of water. This process is now used throughout the world to eliminate harmful bacteria in drinking water. Dr. Wolman dedicated much of his career to consulting local, national, and international organizations and governments on sanitation and environmental issues.

When Abel Wolman was growing up in Baltimore, he had to carry water from a well. It is fitting that he is credited with the design of a water system that has now met the needs of this growing city for the last 50 years. Furthermore, Baltimore's system has remained a model that cities around the world admire. I know all Marylanders join in extending our sympathy to M. Gordon Wolman, his son, who has followed in the great tradition of his father, and all of his family.

I ask that the editorials from the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Baltimore Sun be reprinted in the RECORD.

The articles are as follows:

[From the Baltimore Evening Sun, Feb. 23, 1989]

ABEL WOLMAN

His diminutive size and agility in movement gave him a certain elfin appearance, but the eyes bore an unmistakable resemblance to great reservoirs. And little wonder, because it was the eyes of Abel Wolman which envisioned a world in which that most basic of necessities, water to drink, would be safe and plentiful to all peoples of the world.

His beneficent influence is now felt in the remotest reaches of the world each time a child drinks a glass of water without fear of contracting typhoid, cholera, dysentery or some other waterborne scourge so common before Wolman's methods became the world standard for cleanliness in water. But no city can be more thankful for his life and work than his native Baltimore, whose water supply will be safe and reliable as far as the eye can see.

Abel Wolman, now dead at 96, ranks among those rare individuals who had the capacity to move from the theoretical to the practical with indefatigable determination. He became a legend in his time, but the legend will endure as long as people drink and bathe in water they can accept, as a matter of course, to be clean and healthy.

[The Baltimore Sun, Feb. 24, 1989]

ABEL WOLMAN

Abel Wolman made many of the world's water supplies pure and fit for humans to use. That in itself is enough to qualify him as one of the greatest Baltimoreans of this century. In fact, generations of natives grew up believing—as did countless visitors to the city—that Baltimore distributed the nation's tastiest drinking water. If true, chalk it up to Abel Wolman.

A sanitary engineer of international stature, he helped build water systems and filtration plants in New York City and dozens of other U.S. communities. Similar plants in Israel, India, Africa and Latin America bear his trademark. Dr. Wolman later discovered with Linn H. Enslow, a chemist and former Johns Hopkins University classmate, the formula for successfully chlorinating water.

Like most scientists Dr. Wolman, who died Wednesday at 96, was very practical. He demonstrated his practicality during many of his well-attended lectures as head of the Hopkins Geography and Environmental Department. He felt, as one companion put it, that life was not without risks. He thought about many things, but "I can't conceive of being promised a world in which there are no problems, and I don't want my grandchildren to have the feeling that's what I'm trying to give them. That would be a bore."

For Abel Wolman, life was never a bore. He enjoyed his seniority and wore it well. A sprightly man, he never drove a car. He managed nevertheless to travel across continents until recently. He enjoyed being placed next to attractive women at dinner, telling them and anyone else what most worried him—everything from the deteriorating ozone layer to sludge in Back River.

Dr. Wolman was a scientist who lived life scientifically, believing for instance in nuclear power as a sound and inexpensive energy source. And yet he was in closer touch with the environment than most realized. He was a familiar figure walking on or near Hopkins' Homewood campus. Dr. Wolman collected many honors for his countless contributions, among them the National Medal of Science and the Lewis Dollinger Pure Environment Award. More than that, he won silent acclaim practically every day from working men and women in this area who drew water from a faucet and smacked their lips.●

THE 71ST ANNIVERSARY OF ESTONIAN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on February 24, Estonians around the world celebrated the 71st anniversary of their nation's declaration of independence. The celebration took place against the moving and courageous reaffirmation of national integrity now taking place in Estonia. That is why it is an especially happy occasion for all Americans to join Estonian-Americans in celebrating not just their declaration of independence, but the extraordinary events of recent times.

From the beginning, independence of spirit has been the hallmark of the Estonian people—as indeed it is today. The battleground of endless foreign rivalries for more than 1,000 years, Estonia emerged from World War I a newly independent nation eager to take the path of democracy, modeling its constitution on those of the French, Swiss, and the Americans. With its democratic institutions and burgeoning economy, Estonia soon proved to be a model of political freedom, economic growth and academic and educational excellence.

Yet reflecting on Estonia's brief period of sovereignty, we remember how quickly liberty and freedom were suppressed in 1940 by the Soviet invasion and how the Estonians have suffered through the long dark period of Soviet repression. Throughout those difficult years, Estonians cherished the memory of what their land once was and the vision of what it could be in the future.

That vision is today bright with hope, as Estonians seek to decide how they will live and control their own destiny. Five months ago fully one-third of the Estonian population attended a rally in support of reform, democracy and independence. The Estonian Parliament has passed a bill asserting its right to veto legislation passed by Moscow that infringes on local autonomy.

The newly formed Estonian Popular Front, committee to political and economic reform, is working to place candidates on the ballot and to build a pluralistic political system. In fact, the Estonian Popular Front has adopted a program demanding free elections, constitutional guarantees, and an end to military service.

In this hopeful time, it is appropriate to pay tribute to the many courageous leaders who suffered grievously in the past for their beliefs. Among them is Mart Niklus, who first translated the Universal Declaration of Human Rights into Estonian and spent many years in Soviet labor camps and prisons, including the notorious Perm camp 36-1; he has recently been released from prison and was a delegate to the Popular Front's convention.

Another is Enn Tarto who was imprisoned for distributing unofficial literature, establishing contacts with emigres and signing statements protesting the Soviet Union's annexation of the Baltic States. He too has been freed and continues to work for national integrity.

Yet another is Juri Kukk. He died in 1981, and his untimely death cut short a truly heroic life. Although he did not survive his terrible ordeal, he left behind indelible memories of his devotion to freedom.

Estonian-Americans share the proud independence and integrity of spirit, that we see everywhere in Estonian life today. The Estonian American contributions to the fabric of American life—to our communities, culture, politics, economy—are unique. Together we pay tribute to the extraordinary developments now taking place in Estonia. All of us are sobered by the enormous challenge which Estonia faces, and deeply hopeful for the opportunities that lie ahead.●

THE HEROIC EFFORTS OF UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO EMPLOYEES DURING THE CLARK COUNTY WEATHER DISASTER JANUARY 31, 1989

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, what is now being called the worst blizzard in the history of Clark County began on Tuesday, January 31, 1989. Before it ended on Sunday, February 5, the 19 inches of snow already on the ground and 2 new inches was blown by 40-mile-an-hour winds into 15-foot drifts in Clark County, ID. Recorded temperatures fell to 27 degrees below zero, dropping the wind chill factor to 90 degrees below zero.

Losses to livestock owners in Clark County were significant. One rancher lost approximately where the wind chill factor reached 110 degrees below zero 840 head of cattle, 700 head of sheep, and 40 head of horses during this storm. Losses would have been higher but for the heroic efforts of many in the local community. Of special note is the diligence of University of Idaho employees who worked continually to save over 1,100 head of sheep and 21 horses at the U.S. Sheep Experiment Station in Dubois, ID. Because of the dedicated efforts of these employees, losses at the experiment station were limited to the deaths of only 25 sheep.

During the storm, the sheep experiment station was snowed in. The only vehicle able to enter was the Bonneville County search and rescue snowcat from Idaho Falls. All rescue efforts were dependent upon the limited mobility of the experiment station vehicles and the tireless human efforts of the employees.

Sheep which were wintering on the nearby range were rounded up and loaded on station trailers. At times it was necessary to remove these sheep by hand in order to ensure they were safety sheltered in barns and sheds on the experiment station grounds. Many of the station employees suffered frostbite on their hands and faces because of the extreme cold and winds. Not only should these employees be recognized for their efforts, they should be commended for their dedication to their jobs.

Because of their efforts, losses to the university and the Federal Government were limited. University personnel at the station estimate that the efforts of these employees, saved over 52,500 of taxpayer dollars. I would personally like to commend the following university employees who rescued, FED, and cared for the experiment station sheep, horses, and dogs during the brunt of the storm: Max Quinn Jacobson, sheep operations manager; Homer Wells, research data technician; Jane Kruesi, animal husbandman; Keith Stewart, journeyman electrician; Hal Gamett, assistant maintenance/assistant herdsman; Levi Moss, maintenance craftsman apprentice; Kim Hemenway, veterinarian; Rod Traughber, I.H. animal science technician; Mark Williams; I.H. physiology technician; and Jay D. Little, Sr., I.H. general labor.

I am sure that there were others who assisted in these efforts. Station managers and program coordinators were also vital in the efforts to save the sheep and other animals at the station. To all those who assisted in these efforts, I extend my thanks and gratitude for a job well done. These fine and dedicated individuals, make me proud I am a Idahoan.●

OMNIBUS GLOBAL WARMING INITIATIVE

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of Senator WIRTH'S Omnibus Global Warming Initiative, S. 324. The need for a comprehensive national energy policy has become so apparent, it can no longer be ignored. I commend Senator WIRTH for this creative and ambitious legislative effort. This is an effort in which I have been active in the past. I plan to continue that active involvement.

Throughout my Senate career I have advocated expansion of research efforts for our Earth, oceans, and atmosphere. In the past I have supported measures to establish a global foresight capability with respect to natural resources, the environment, and population. I have been supportive of the research efforts undertaken by NOAA and NASA. Those agencies have been conducting research on ocean and atmospheric interactions on a global scale, global air quality, ocean pollution, and global climatic change.

There is a growing concern among scientists that mankind is dangerously altering the Earth's atmosphere through the introduction of huge quantities of greenhouse gases. The continued alteration of our atmosphere may fundamentally change the conditions governing life on Earth by altering the basic climatic conditions under which we live. Since the turn of the century, the concentration of CO_2 in the atmosphere has risen approximately 30 percent, with almost half of that increase in the last 25 years. If no actions are taken, and present trends continue CO_2 and other greenhouse gases will continue to accumulate in the atmosphere. The inevitable result would be an increase in the Earth's average surface temperatures of between 3 and 8 degrees Farenheit. Temperatures in that range could exceed anything experienced during the last 5,000 years. This is the essence of the so-called greenhouse effect problem.

In addition to CO_2, other greenhouse gases such as methane [CH_4] nitrous oxide [N_2O], and the chlorofluorocarbons [CFCS] are also accumulating in the atmosphere. The emissions of these gases are associated with a broad array of human activities including the production and use of fossil fuels, global deforestation, the raising of livestock, production of rice, and the manufacture of CFC's.

Appropriate action could delay the deepening of greenhouse effect by half a century or more. Such a delay could be crucial, and could spell the difference between disastrously rapid climate change and a manageable transition.

The United States can move to reduce its own emissions of CO_2 and other greenhouse gases in the near-term, and, in addition, pursue vigorously the development of new technologies to provide further reductions over the long term. We must fund research which will improve existing new nongreenhouse gas emitting technologies and develop new ones that are safe, economical, and reliable.

The United States must take a strong leadership role by aggressively bringing the greenhouse effect issue to the attention of the global community, leading the world community in emissions reductions and developing safe, economic, and reliable technologies. The greenhouse effect problem is not just a U.S. problem. It is a global problem and must be addressed by the entire global community.

A strategy of emissions reduction, aggressive research and development, and strong international leadership will not only result in a safer environmental future for the United States and the world, but will also enhance U.S. security and competitiveness.

I would note Mr. President, that while I support a number of provisions contained in this bill, there are also provisions which would be better served to be assessed on their individual merits. In developing solutions to the problem of global warming we must exercise caution to avoid unintended adverse effects on the environment and the world economy.

Specifically, I wish to reserve judgment on the Tongass timber reform provision contained within S. 324. Due to the issue's complex and sensitive nature, I believe this issue should be studied individually by Congress. I understand that the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee has held hearings on this issue. I also plan to carefully study this situation, and will follow the hearing process and business sessions of the committee closely.

Mr. President, I commend Senator WIRTH for his dedication to the issue of a comprehensive national energy policy. I look forward to working with him and other cosponsors in crafting this legislation to be a thoughtful and responsible approach to a complex problem.●

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the most pressing problem facing President Bush and the 101st Congress is the Federal deficit. And the games we have played with the budget figures makes the deficit appear smaller than it really is. In a column I write for newspapers in my State, I have outlined how including Social Security funds in the budget is fooling us into believing we are spending less for interest than we actually are. I ask to have it reprinted in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEFICIT

If you think the federal government's deficit is bad, let me assure you that it is actually worse than it appears.

The budget is deceptive because we include Social Security funds in the budget, a move made when the financial pressure from the Vietnam War made the deficit grow—and the nation's leadership wanted to "solve" the deficit problem without doing what Harry Truman had us do during the Korean War: Increase taxes to pay for the war.

The nation came through the Korean War with almost no increase in the deficit and almost no increase in inflation. It was a great tribute to President Truman and his staff.

But during the Vietnam War President Johnson accepted some bad advice: Pull Social Security trust funds into the budget, and the deficit won't look that bad, and we won't have to increase taxes to pay for the war. It is a decision the nation is paying for to this day.

Formal estimates suggest we face a federal government deficit of $148 billion for fiscal year 1989. But that figure is deceptive. The Social Security funds have a temporary surplus for the year of $52 billion, meaning that the real deficit is $199 billion if the Social Security funds are not counted.

The danger of including Social Security in the budget figures is that we fool ourselves into believing the situation is better than it is. And then the temptation is to "solve" the deficit problem by cutting back on Social Security benefits.

Social Security should be taken away from the budget, so that we have a clean look at what we are doing. And so that we are not tempted to take from the Social Security funds in order to balance the budget temporarily, funds that will be needed to pay retirement benefits in years to come.

The Social Security part of the budget also fools us into believing we are spending less for interest than we actually are.

Budget figures indicate we will be spending $163 billion for interest this fiscal year. Actually that is what the book-jugglers call the "net interest payment." They deduct the interest earned by Social Security before announcing the interest costs, a practice that is both deceptive and dangerous.

The real interest payment by the federal government this fiscal year is called the "gross interest payment," or $234 billion.

The fastest growing item in the budget is interest.

There is only one way to change that: Stop piling up more and more debt.

We need to get hold of our deficit situation, a problem now complicated by the difficulties faced by many of the nation's savings and loans, difficulties that will cost us next year somewhere between $30 billion and $70 billion above earlier estimates.

We have to stop borrowing from our children and grandchildren. That's what a deficit does.

But we also have to stop borrowing from our parents and our grandparents. That's what having Social Security as part of the federal budget does.

The number one problem facing the new President and the new Congress is the federal deficit.

We should stop playing games with the figures, and do what is necessary to move decisively toward a balanced budget.●

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, when the Senate completes its business today I intend to recess the Senate over until 11:30 a.m. on Wednesday.

On Wednesday, after the recognition of the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business not to exceed 30 minutes with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

Under the previous order, the Senate will then turn to the consideration of the Sullivan nomination at 12 noon on Wednesday with a rollcall vote to occur at 1 p.m.

RECESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11:30 a.m. on Wednesday, March 1.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE OLDER AMERICANS ALTERNATIVE CARE ACT OF 1989

HON. LEON E. PANETTA
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reintroduce legislation that would expand and encourage the use of home health care as a humane, cost-effective alternative form of care for the elderly. This legislation recognizes our rapidly growing elderly population, and the fact that the current system fails to adequately care for the elderly who suffer from chronic illnesses. As you know, I have also introduced companion legislation, H.R. 990, to make adult day care an eligible activity under Medicare.

Institutional care, while expensive, is clearly appropriate and necessary for many of our older citizens. However, it makes no sense at all to emphasize or encourage institutional care for all elderly Americans. It has been clearly demonstrated that we have resources available to provide cost-effective compassionate alternatives through a range of services, including the utilization of healthy seniors in helping their peers remain as independent as possible, as long as possible.

At present, it is estimated that the number of Americans age 65 and over is growing at twice the rate of the general population and currently makes up almost 12 percent of our populace; in the year 2000, there will be almost 35 million persons over 65 and nearly 5 million over 85. As the number of elderly continues to grow, meeting their long-term health needs will be a challenge for our present system. Just as this group must not be left without adequate health care, they also should not be forced into one setting. Rather, they should have a number of options as to the type of treatment they wish to receive and the type of environment in which they can live. Obviously, many of those who need long-term care, as well as their families, would much prefer to be able to remain in their own homes rather than having to enter a nursing home, often outside their community.

The legislation I am introducing today, along with the Medicare adult day care amendments, seeks to address this current dilemma and encourage the use of cost-effective and humane forms of health care. My bill would expand and liberalize the home health care benefit under Medicare by adding periodic chore and respite care services as a category of home care services, strengthen and expand the Senior Companion Program under which able seniors provide assistance to their disabled peers, and offer a $250 refundable tax credit to persons who care for a parent in their home. The last provision would provide some relief and recognition to the millions of those who act as primary caregivers for their elderly parents.

Studies have shown that if adequate home health services were available through Medicare, approximately 2.5 million persons could be kept out of institutions. With the cost pressures currently facing the Medicare Program and our Federal Government generally, the cost-effectiveness of home care should certainly be utilized more extensively. It has also been reported that whereas the cost of care in a nursing home averages $24,000 annually, home care may cost one-third that amount. This being the reality, we must take full advantage of such opportunities.

Our country faces a major challenge in seeking to care for our Nation's elderly, and to do so in ways that preserve their dignity and, where possible, enable them to remain in their own homes and communities. We must move forward with necessary reforms to ensure that quality health care will be available and affordable for the growing elderly population. As we consider proposals in this area, the utilization of cost-effective and humane alternatives like home health care must be a significant part of health care reform efforts. We must take action to try to ensure that old age is something which is looked forward to, rather than dreaded. I urge the support of my colleagues for this proposal.

H.R. □ 1163

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Older Americans Alternative Care Act of 1989".

TITLE I—MEDICARE AMENDMENTS

SEC. 101. INCLUSION OF ADDITIONAL ITEMS AND SERVICES IN HOME HEALTH SERVICES UNDER THE MEDICARE PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1861(m) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395x(m)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, such term also includes periodic chore services (as defined in subsection (mm)) in the case of any individual with respect to whom there is in effect a plan for furnishing such services (to that individual) which has been established and is periodically reviewed by the appropriate health professional under regulations, and respite care services (as defined in subsection (nn)) for not more than 52 days in any calendar year as determined by the Secretary taking into consideration the need for such services with respect to the individual for whom they are provided and the person who normally cares for the individual.".

(b) PERIODIC CHORE SERVICES AND RESPITE CARE SERVICES DEFINED.—Section 1861 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395x) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"Periodic Chore Services

"(mm) For purposes of the last sentence of subsection (m), the term 'periodic chore services' means services which are performed in the home of an aged, blind, or disabled adult individual (who is entitled under this title to benefits with respect to home health services) to help such individual remain in or return to such home, maintain or strengthen his capacity for self-care, and maintain or raise his level of functioning in the areas of personal care and household management, when such individual is unable to perform such services by or for himself, whether or not such individual also requires the services of a home health aide or other specialist. Such term includes the performance for an individual of household tasks, transportation for medical visits, and essential shopping and transportation to and from multipurpose senior centers (as defined in title III of the Older Americans Act of 1965) and nutrition projects (such as those funded under part C of title III of such Act), essential shopping and simple household repairs, assistance in outdoor walking, and other services furnished to an individual which are determined necessary, in the interest of the health and safety of the individual, to maintain him in his home.

"Respite Care Services

"(nn) For purposes of the last sentence of subsection (m), the term 'respite care services' means services for an individual who is unable to care for himself or herself on a full-time basis, which are provided on a temporary basis to such individual because of the absence of the person who normally cares for such individual, but only if such individual is a dependent of such other person for purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. Such services must be provided by persons who have successfully completed a training program as a homemaker/home health aide approved by the Secretary, and such services must be provided in the home of the dependent individual under the supervision of a registered nurse who is employed by a certified home health agency, homemaker-home health aide agency, or local public health department. Such services shall, when necessary and appropriate, be provided in addition to other services under this title to ensure that such individual receives a coordinated system of services designed to help the individual reach his or her maximum level of independence.".

(c) COVERAGE OF SERVICES IN ADULT DAY CARE CENTERS.—Section 1861(m) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395x(m)) is amended by inserting after "individual's home", in the matter preceding paragraph (1), the following: "or in an adult day care center which is a center eligible for funds under title XX of this Act and which meets standards prescribed by the Secretary and applicable State and local health and safety requirements".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to items and services furnished on or after the first day of the month following the month in which this Act is enacted.

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

TITLE II—SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM

SEC. 201. REVISION OF PROGRAM.

Section 213 of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 5013) is amended to read as follows:

"SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM

"SEC. 213. (a) The Director is authorized to make grants or contracts to carry out the purpose described in section 211(a) through the establishment of senior companion programs. Each senior companion program—

"(1) shall be designed to encourage older persons receiving assistance under such program to participate actively in the affairs of their communities, to help themselves to the extent possible in order to lead independent lives outside of institutional settings, to take advantage of services and activities available to older persons under the senior companion program, and to reach out to their peers for companionship and assistance to the extent possible; and

"(2) shall be administered by a public or private nonprofit community-based organization of proven ability in providing services and assistance to older persons, except that such program may be administered under the auspices of a hospital in the community involved in any case in which administration by a public or private nonprofit community-based organization is not feasible or appropriate in such community.

"(b) Each organization responsible for the administration of a senior companion program—

"(1) shall take such action as may be necessary to minimize costs associated with the administration of such program;

"(2) shall train senior companions through the use of available community resources, to the extent practicable, in order to minimize administrative costs and in order to coordinate the operation of such program with the activities of other community agencies and organizations; and

"(3) shall organize personnel participating in such progam in the manner specified in subsection (c).

"(c)(1) The personnel administering each senior companion program shall consist of individuals serving as directors, supervising senior companions, and senior companions. Each director shall be responsible for overall administration of such program and for the supervision of approximately 10 supervising senior companions participating in such program.

"(2) Each supervising senior companion—

"(A) shall be responsible for the supervision of approximately 15 senior companions;

"(B) may participate in such program for not more than 40 hours during any workweek; and

"(C) shall devote 50 percent of such work period to the provision of services and assistance to older persons as a senior companion, and shall devote the balance of such work period to coordinating the activities of individuals serving as senior companions in such program.

"(3) Each individual serving as a senior companion—

"(A) shall participate in the senior companion program as a part-time volunteer for not more than 20 hours during any workweek; and

"(B) shall be responsible for the provision of services and assistance to approximately 20 older persons.

The number of older persons which may be served by a senior companion shall be based upon the needs of such older persons, distances which the senior companion is required to travel in order to serve such older persons, and other factors present in the community involved (such as the provision of services and assistance in congregate housing programs and in ethnic communities). The director of any such program, in determining the number of older persons which may be served by each senior companion participating in such program, shall ensure that the nature and quality of service provided by each senior companion is not adversely affected by the number of older persons for whom such senior companion is responsible.

"(d) Each individual serving as a senior companion—

"(1) shall work primarily with homebound older persons, except that such senior companion may enter into cooperative agreements with nursing home officials for the purpose of identifying older persons who are able to return to their homes if support services are made available to them in their homes; and

"(2) shall provide such older person with a variety of personal care services, nutritional services, social and recreational services, home management services, and information and advocacy services, which may include (A) shopping assistance; (B) transportation for medical or other appointments; (C) letter writing; (D) maintaining contacts with family members and friends; (E) bill payments and other financial matters; (F) meal preparation assistance; (G) minor housekeeping chores, sewing, minor home repairs, and personal hygiene services and other personal care services; (H) companionship and socialization; and (I) initiating contacts with social service providers, including providers of (i) mobile meal services; (ii) chore or homemaker services; (iii) nursing services; (iv) income assistance services; (v) transportation; (vi) social and recreational programs; (vii) medical services; and (viii) income tax assistance.

"(e) Each older person to whom such a senior companion is assigned shall have an initial assessment of the person's needs performed by a qualified registered nurse, medical social worker, or similar professional, which assessment shall include an evaluation of—

"(1) the availability and quality of food at the home of such older person;

"(2) whether such home is safe, clean, and sufficiently heated or cooled;

"(3) the ability of such older person to care for personal hygiene needs with appropriate assistance and encouragement from such senior companion;

"(4) the availability of needed medical and rehabilitative supplies;

"(5) the ability of such older person to manage financial resources and affairs; and

"(6) whether such older person requires any immediate professional assistance, as the result of despondency, drug dependence, or other similar factors.

"(f) Not more than 10 percent of any funds received by any public or private nonprofit organization under this section may be expended for administrative services which are not directly related to the provision of services or assistance to older persons.".

SEC. 202. EXTENSION AND INCREASE IN AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 502(c) of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 5082(c)) is amended by striking "and" after "1988,", and by inserting after "1989," the following: "and $100,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1990 and 1991".

TITLE III—INCOME TAX CREDIT FOR MAINTAINING HOUSEHOLDS WHICH INCLUDE DEPENDENTS WHO HAVE ATTAINED AGE 65

SEC. 301. REFUNDABLE CREDIT FOR MAINTAINING HOUSEHOLDS WHICH INCLUDE DEPENDENTS WHO HAVE ATTAINED AGE 65.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Subpart C of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to refundable credits) is amended by inserting after section 35 the following new section:

"SEC. 36. MAINTAINING HOUSEHOLDS WHICH INCLUDE DEPENDENTS WHO HAVE ATTAINED AGE 65.

"(a) $250 CREDIT ALLOWED.—A $250 credit against the tax imposed by this subtitle for the taxable year shall be allowed to a taxpayer who has 1 or more qualified dependents for the taxable year.

"(b) DEFINITION AND SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) QUALIFIED DEPENDENT DEFINED.—The term 'qualified dependent' means any individual who—

"(A) has as his principal place of abode the principal residence of the taxpayer, and is a member of the taxpayer's household, for more than 270 days of the calendar year during which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins,

"(B) is a dependent of the taxpayer (within the meaning of section 152) for such calendar year, and

"(C) has attained the age of 65 before the close of such calendar year.

"(2) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(A) MAINTAINING A HOUSEHOLD.—An individual shall be treated as maintaining a household for any period only if half the cost of maintaining the household for such period is furnished by such individual (or, if the individual is married, by the individual and his spouse).

"(B) MARRIED COUPLES MUST FILE JOINT RETURNS.—The credit shall be allowed under subsection (a) to a taxpayer who is married (within the meaning of section 7703) only if the taxpayer and his spouse file a joint return under section 6013 for the taxable year.

"(C) CERTAIN MARRIED INDIVIDUALS LIVING APART.—If—

"(i) an individual who is married and who files a separate return maintains a household which includes a qualified dependent,

"(ii) over half the cost of maintaining such household is furnished by such individual, and

"(iii) during the last 6 months of the taxable year, the spouse of such individual is not a member of such household, such individual shall, for purposes of this section, not be treated as married.

"(D) MULTIPLE SUPPORT AGREEMENTS.—In making any determination of the amount furnished by the taxpayer for maintaining a household, such amount shall include any amount contributed under a multiple support agreement for the support of any qualified dependent to the extent the amount contributed is treated as received from the taxpayer under section 152(c)."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for subpart C of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 35 the following new item:

"Sec. 36. Maintaining households which include dependents who have attained age 65."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1989.

THE UTILITY RATEPAYER REFUND ACT OF 1989

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when we in Congress passed the Tax Reform Act of 1986, we thought we brought more fairness to the Tax Code. We eliminated loopholes, we discouraged tax-motivated investments, and we reduced the tax rates for all Americans.

Unfortunately, there was a "wrinkle" in the Tax Reform Act—an obscure section which is preventing utility customers from receiving a timely refund of $19 billion in excess deferred taxes. Under section 203(e) utilities may normalize the return of this $19 billion, which means consumers will wait as long as 30 years for the full refund.

Today, I am introducing the Utility Ratepayer Refund Act to repeal section 203(e) of the 1986 TRA. The result would be that Federal and State regulatory authorities would be able to decide on a case-by-case basis when ratepayers should be refunded this $19 billion. Thus, the bill is in keeping with the major goal of tax reform—fairness.

Utilities currently hold about $73 billion in deferred taxes. For years the tax laws have allowed utilities—gas, electric, telephone, water—to depreciate plant and equipment over different lengths of time for income tax and ratemaking purposes. Utilities today may collect through today's rates Federal income taxes that will not be owed to the Treasury for many—perhaps 20 to 30—years. These are called deferred taxes, and collectively the utilities hold about $73 billion in accumulated deferred taxes.

Approximately $19 billion of this $73 billion is excess deferred tax money. Prior to the Tax Reform Act of 1986 consumers had been paying utility bills based on the anticipation that utilities eventually would pay Federal taxes at 46 percent on corporate earnings, but the Tax Reform Act reduced the rate from 46 to 34 percent. Thus, utilities no longer owe the Federal Government all the deferred taxes previously collected from consumers. The utilities must return about $19 billion in excess deferred taxes to the consumer. The utilities acknowledge that this money must be returned to ratepayers, but utilities want to hold onto it for as long as possible, and section 203(e) of the TRA allows them to do just that.

Section 203(e) of the Tax Reform Act should be repealed because it is unfair to utility customers and it usurps State regulatory authority. This section makes some customers wait over 30 years to get the final installment of their refund from a utility. This is of little comfort to our senior citizens who are on tight budgets. Moreover, the section puts the Federal Government in the role of regulating utilities, which is normally a State matter.

The Utility Ratepayer Refund Act of 1989 will allow the State utility regulators to decide, on a case-by-case basis, when the $19 billion in excess deferred taxes should go to consumers. The bill does not mandate any return schedule; it simply leaves it up to State regulators to decide. After all, it is the State regulators who know best the financial condition of their State utilities. The State regulators are in the best position to decide how quickly these excess deferred taxes should go back to the consumers.

Let's get the Federal Government out of an area of regulation in which it does not belong. This is a reasonable bill that unties the hands of the State regulatory authorities and treats the consumer fairly. That's why a broad coalition of consumer groups, industrial users, regulatory authorities, and others support this bill.

I urge you to become a cosponsor of the Utility Ratepayer Refund Act of 1989.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. □ 1150

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Utility Ratepayer Refund Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. REPEAL OF EXTENSION OF NORMALIZATION REQUIREMENT TO TREATMENT OF EXCESS DEFERRED TAX RESERVES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (e) of section 203 of the Tax Reform Act of 1986 (relating to normalization requirements) is hereby repealed.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The repeal made by subsection (a) shall take effect as if subsection (e) of section 203 of such Act had never been enacted.

AGRICULTURAL PAPERWORK REDUCTIONS AND IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in sponsoring a bill to require the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare a report delineating specific proposals to reduce paperwork and recordkeeping required of farmers and to determine the feasibility of establishing an electronic system, with appropriate fees and safeguards, to aid in the paperwork and recordkeeping reduction. I congratulate the gentleman from Montana, Mr. MARLENEE, for his foresight in this area. I truly believe that this is a concept that will ultimately provide farmers with the tools they need to continue to improve the efficiency of their operations. In addition, the USDA will benefit through increased compatibility of their systems and improved information.

The bill, of which I am an original cosponsor, requires the Secretary of Agriculture to submit, within 240 days of enactment, a report to the Congress delineating specific proposals to reduce and simplify recordkeeping and other paperwork requirements. Such proposals will apply to programs covering application and participation in Federal price support programs, soil and water conservation programs, crop insurance, and loan activities of the Farmers Home Administration. In addition, the Secretary is asked to study systems in which farmers and cooperatives will be provided access to a computerized system within the USDA. Under such a system the Secretary is required to also determine an appropriate fee structure and assure all safeguards are in place.

Under today's system farmers must spend several days each month completing forms and keeping records in order to participate in the USDA programs. They must go from office to office to provide what in many instances is duplicate information to the Farmers Home Administration; to the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service [ASCS]; and, to the Soil Conservation Service. While these various agencies of the USDA are attempting to improve their systems, there are still problems. There is a lack of coordination, and computer systems are not compatible between agencies. I am informed that over the past several years various computer systems have been acquired by the several agencies of the USDA on an agency-by-agency basis with no thought to adopting compatible or unified systems. The end result is that ASCS, the agency responsible for the day-to-day management of farm programs, has computers throughout the country which will not share basic information regarding farm operations with the Farmers Home Administration or the Federal Crop Insurance System.

Additionally, the Soil Conservation Service computers cannot retrieve information from local ASCS offices in order to help farmers to meet the vitally important conservation requirements of the 1985 farm bill.

As farmers seek to participate in the USDA programs, their requirements cross program lines. The hurdles farmers must scale are numerous, going from office to office, providing the same information to different agencies. That they can accomplish this feat is often a reflection of their abilities rather than those of the system presented to them. I believe that efforts have been made by the USDA to address these problems. However, I also believe that there is much room for improvement. That is the purpose of this bill.

The goal of this bill is to provide the means to thoroughly examine the subject of reducing paperwork and recordkeeping requirements and unified computer systems and to report to the Congress for our further consideration. Farmers and USDA will welcome this effort to aid them in becoming more productive and lessen the burdens of an increasingly complex system.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE MFJ RESTRICTIONS HURT U.S. TRADE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, last year, the Congress passed telecommunications trade legislation aimed at opening up foreign markets to U.S. exports of telecommunications equipment and services. Political support for the legislation was broad-based in light of the perceived intransigence of a number of foreign countries to open their markets to our producers and a recognition of the importance of the telecom sector trade deficit and the critical need to avoid having our Nation's telecommunication's industry go the way of automobiles, consumer electronics, shoes, steel, and textiles. We are proceeding now with the implementation phase of the legislation passed last year in hopes that it will help to open markets and allow for increased U.S. sales abroad.

At the same time, we recognize that if foreign markets did open and as a result U.S. sales abroad were equal proportionally to foriegn sales in this country the effect of this turnaround in telecom trade on the sectoral deficit would be negligible simply because of the large disparity in size between United States and foreign telecom markets. Nevertheless we must proceed vigorously on this track to improve our export capability. At the same time the deficit for telecommunications equipment and services now stands at $4 billion and shows every sign of worsening in the future. We recognize that perhaps the major reason for the widening gap in the sectoral deficit is our increasing domestic consumption of foreign imported telecom products and services. One possible factor in this equation is the restriction which prevent a significant component of the U.S. telecommunications industry, the Bell holding companies, from entering the very same markets, manufacturing and information services, where the deficit is being experienced.

In light of the critical importance of telecommunications to U.S. productivity and competitiveness as well as to the Nation continuing as a world leader in technology development we cannot afford to ignore the possibility that these restrictions are hurting the U.S. trade position in this vital area. It may therefore be an appropriate time for Congress to review the judicially imposed policy in place which enforces these restrictions to assess and determine whether in light of possible negative implications for U.S. trade, technology, productivity and competitiveness the restrictions should remain in effect or possibly be replaced by a system of more flexible regulatory safeguards. There are a number of complex, thorny problems associated with removing the restrictions which warrant close and careful scrutiny by Congress. And jurisidiction for review of this policy lies in the Energy and Commerce Committee.

I want to submit for the Record, however, a trade rationale for why Congress should begin this examination and why all Members with trade interests should take an interest in reviewing these issues.

THE MFJ RESTRICTIONS HURT U.S. TRADE

The MFJ restrictions, which prohibit the Bell holding companies from manufacturing and providing information services, have been a major factor in the recent, and dramatic deterioration of U.S. telecommunications trade and present a serious threat to our future trade interests.

Whereas the trade problems that afflict other U.S. industries relate more directly to economic factors such as currency valuations or comparative labor and production costs, the decline in our telecom trade position is due in large part to domestic policy, namely the divestiture of AT&T and the imposition of the MFJ restrictions on the resulting Bell holding companies. The policy of divestiture was formed without any regard for its impact on telecommunications trade. In fact, from a trade perspective, the AT&T consent decree could not have been more poorly constructed.

Traditionally, U.S. trade policy has promoted access to markets because open entry encourages competition, benefits consumers and leads to increased productivity and efficiency. By contrast, artificial barriers to entry, unfair restraint of trade and protection from competition have been rejected as inhibitors of trade performance. Divestiture was clearly at odds with this established policy because it opened the U.S. market to major foreign companies, many of which are subsidized by their national governments, while summarily closing it to seven of this nation's largest telecommunications firms. The MFJ restrictions not only prevent the Bell companies from entering and competing with foreign suppliers in our own domestic manufacturing and information services markets, but also prohibit then from producing equipment and information services in this country for export abroad.

Trade performance is largely a function of effective resource commitment. Because the Bell companies control nearly two-thirds of the U.S. telecom industry assets and the U.S. telecom equipment market constitutes one-half the world market, divestiture and the MFJ restrictions effectively disarmed U.S. trade capability, gave away U.S. market share to foreign companies and handicapped the U.S. potential for gaining global market share. It is no wonder, therefore, that divestiture has been called a unilateral trade concession to foreign interests. Nor is it surprising, that trade statistics confirm that foreign suppliers have been the principal beneficiaries of divestiture with astonishing sales growth in the U.S. market.

Since the breakup of the Bell System was announced in January 1982, the U.S. telecommunications trade balance has fallen to a deficit of nearly $4 billion ($2.6 billion in equipment and $1.4 billion in services). Inasmuch as U.S. exports of telecom equipment have risen steadily, the explanation for the deficit lies in our increasing consumption of foreign produced equipment and services, a condition largely caused by the fact that the Bell companies are buyers only, not sellers in competition with foreign companies for U.S. market share. Future deficits may be much worse as foreign suppliers target the rapidly expanding digital network switching equipment, fiber optics, and information services markets. The Commerce Department estimates a loss to the economy of 25,000 jobs for every billion dollars in deficit trade.

As long as the MFJ restrictions remain in place, U.S. trade performance and competitive standing in domestic and global telecommunications markets will remain imbalanced and disadvantaged. These judicially-imposed restraints are not only anticompetitive but pose a long-term threat to the nation's telecommunications trade position. Specifically, the restrictions:

Prevent the Bell companies from commercializing R&D investment. Unable to recover their investment costs in the restricted market areas, the Bell companies have few incentives to engage in R&D. This impact occurs at a time when the U.S. needs to commit all its resources and fully mobilize its research potential in order to be more competitive in global high-tech markets.

"Warehouse" two-thirds of the U.S. telecom industry's capital assets in ways that 1) deny venture capital to new or existing, small and medium sized U.S. manufacturers and information service providers, and; 2) discourage innovation of the new telecom services and equipment that business users need to become more productive and competitive.

Expose U.S. companies to increased threat of foreign acquisition. The restrictions encourage foreign-based firms to target the U.S. market and the fastest way to gain both market share and advanced technology is by buying promising U.S. companies.

Force the Bell companies to adopt a procurement strategy that contributes to the telecom trade deficit. Because the largest U.S. equipment supplier, AT&T, also competes with the Bell companies in local exchange service markets it is in a position to control the introduction of new technology in ways that give its local services a competitive edge. Rather than risk being deprived of the new technology they need, many Bell companies have turned to what is often the only alternative source of supply: foreign companies. Since Bell company network equipment purchases represent about 25% of world demand, the MFJ restrictions have created what is essentially a "safe harbor" in the U.S. for foreign suppliers.

Drive "intelligence" out of the public switched network by preventing the Bell companies from developing the innovative technology necessary to provide the enhanced services customers now demand. Instead, intelligence is being built into customer-premises equipment, a market now dominated by foreign suppliers.

In short, because domestic policy developments, such as divestiture and the imposition of the MFJ restrictions, have contributed substantially to U.S. telecom trade problems, improving U.S. competitiveness in these markets will depend on domestic policy solutions. Replacing the outright prohibitions on Bell company entry into manufacturing and information services with a more flexible and appropriate system of regulatory safeguards is a step that must be taken if recent trade trends are to be reversed. Unleashing the potential of the Bell companies is essential to preserving America's superiority in technology development, leveling the playing field in telecom trade and ensuring that the U.S. telecommunications industry does not go the way of automobiles, consumer electronics, shoes, steel and textiles.

TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL McMAHON

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring special attention to a constituent of mine who recently demonstrated uncommon bravery in the rescue of two individuals from their burning home.

Mr. Michael McMahon, a volunteer firefighter from Smithtown, NY, was quick to arrive at the scene because he was eating lunch at his home, only a half block away. Mr. McMahon learned from neighbors that the house was occupied by an elderly couple, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Crisano. Wearing no protective clothing, Mr. McMahon entered the smoke-filled house in search of its occupants. Forced to crawl on his knees to avoid smoke inhalation, he found Mr. Crisano and brought him to safety. Mr. McMahon then learned that Theresa Crisano, 88, was still inside. Entering the house for a second time, Mr. McMahon went to a different bedroom and found Mrs. Crisano still in her bed. Because she was not able to move, McMahon had to drag her out of the house. Without the heroic actions taken by Michael McMahon, witnesses say both residents of the house would have died.

All firefighters, especially those who volunteer, deserve our thanks. Yet those who put their own lives at considerable risk to save the lives of others merit special recognition. In light of his 17 years as a volunteer firefighter and his courageous rescue efforts, Michael McMahon deserves our highest praise. I ask that my colleagues join me in commending Michael McMahon for his professional dedication and his extraordinary bravery.

FIRST STEPS IN HELPING THE WORKING POOR

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Congressman TOM DOWNEY, acting chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Human Resources, for holding a hearing today on how to help the working poor.

There are many statistics available which prove that poverty among people who work is on the increase. One such statistic reported by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities is the following:

In 1981, a family of three with a full-time minimum wage earner was $280 below the poverty line; in 1987, this family's earnings fell $2,100 below the poverty line.

Collecting statistics becomes valuable only when appropriate action follows. Congressman DOWNEY has taken the first steps in addressing this issue by introducing H.R. 882 with Congressmen GEORGE MILLER and JOHN LEWIS and by scheduling today's hearings.

It is a disgrace that people in our country who work full time can still find themselves eking out an existence, not knowing where their next meal will come from or not knowing how long they can afford the roof over their heads.

I urge my colleagues to get involved in this problem. Cosponsoring H.R. 882 could be the first step.

RESOLUTION PROMOTING STUDENT VOLUNTARISM

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution asking for individual school districts to make youth service programs available to youngsters. These service programs will be incorporated as course electives in secondary school curriculums.

The ethic of service has been a hallmark of our democratic heritage since America's inception, enlisting the spirit and energies of both old and young alike. Thomas Jefferson wrote in 1793 that "a term of duty in whatever line he can be most useful to his country is due from every individual."

Recently there has been a shift in the social consciousness of American youth producing a new student-volunteer movement at many schools across the Nation. An example of this new spirit can be seen at the Moses Brown School in Providence, RI, where students perform a variety of community services including tutoring at-risk students, carpooling senior citizens, and campaigning against drugs. There has been a growing awareness by the education community of the value of students performing community volunteer work as evidenced by over 3,000 high schools having some form of community volunteer programs.

Studies have shown that students participating in school-based service programs can increase scholastic achievements and self-esteem. Furthermore, a higher rate of school attendance has been found among students in volunteer programs. This is especially important when creating service programs that deal with at-risk students.

Voluntarism offers tangible public benefits to the community. In the past, emphasis has been placed mostly on the value of community service to the individual student, ignoring what a community stands to gain from student service programs. According to Youth Service America, young people in our country now contribute at least 250 million hours of service a year. The monetary value of these students performing 250 million hours is $875 million—figured at $3.50 per hour.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this important measure to promote youth service. This Congress must demonstrate our commitment to student voluntarism. The passage of my resolution will send a strong and clear message to the education community that we do. It is time for our Nation to expand on the growing success of community service programs in our schools and teach our children the value of altruism.

ASSISTANCE TO THE U.S. TRAVELER GOING OVERSEAS: THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE EXTENDS A HELPING HAND

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Department of State for taking the initiative to establish a modern advisory system to help Americans planning to travel overseas. A traveler can now call a special number at the Department of State and obtain current information on the advisability of traveling to certain countries around the world. This newly created program is a step in the right direction and the Department has wisely decided to keep traveling Americans informed about current developments in various regions of the world that could have an impact on the safety of travelers.

A few years ago, a constituent of mine encountered serious difficulties during a vacation in Mexico. She was unaware of the Department's former program which made available written advisories for Americans planning overseas travel. My constituent and many other travelers did not realize that this service existed.

After learning of my constituent's unfortunate experience, I wrote to the Department and strongly encouraged that agency to establish a better system for notifying future travelers and also suggested that the availability of this service be more widely publicized.

Under the new advisory system, a traveler calls (202) 647-5225 at the Department in order to listen to a series of recorded travel advisories. Also included in this modernized information program is guidance for helping U.S. citizens in distress overseas as well as guidance concerning the visa requirements of foreign governments.

In addition, the Department of State plans to place interactive TV equipment in passport offices for use by applicants for U.S. passports.
